

DR. FOSTER DECRIES COLLEGE ATHLETICS

Reed School President Says Business Aspect Replaces Educational Value.

MOST STUDENTS NEGLECT

Speaker Declares Present System Intolerable—Fields Are Reserved for Teams—Playground Recreation Impossible.

OAKLAND, Cal., Aug. 28.—(Special.)—Athletics in college and for business was the topic of an address by William T. Foster, of Reed College, before the National Education Association here yesterday.

"All athletics are conducted either for education or for business," said Dr. Foster. "When athletics are conducted for education the aims are, first, to develop all the students and faculty physically and to maintain health; second, to promote necessary recreation, as a preparation for study rather than as a substitute for study; third, to form habits and inculcate ideals of right living. When athletics are conducted for business, the aims are, first, to win games, to defeat another person or group being the chief end; second, to make money, as it is impossible otherwise to carry on athletics as a business; third, to attain individual or group superiority. These three, which are the controlling aims of intercollegiate athletics, are virtually the dominant aims of horse racing, prize fighting and professional baseball.

Dr. Foster declared that the present system of intercollegiate athletics is the greatest physical need of those in greatest physical need. By way of testing this assertion, he said that any institution notable for 'champion' teams, and find out to what extent athletic games are aiding the physical development of the great majority of students who are not already notably above the average in bodily health and vigor. One Saturday morning not long ago, the coach of the champion football team of several states was asked against the use of the athletic field as proposed by the professor of physical education. It was a special case of conflict between the director of athletics for education and the director of athletics for business. Education lost. The field was unscratched, the gate receipts were heavy, the home team gained a victory.

"If our universities had grown up with the ideal of athletics for education they would have made provision for games for their students. What do we find? One university with 3000 students and one playground; another university with 2000 women students and no playground; another university with 5000 students and less than 40 acres of campus; in fact, scarcely a large university in all America with fields sufficient for conducting athletic games in the interests of the bodily health and development of all its students. Cornell, with its many acres of new playgrounds, is the only one.

"The few fields owned by some of the largest universities are not available for play. The 'waxed greensward' at the University of Chicago, protected by a high stone wall, is used not more than 24 hours a year. A tax on idle athletic fields might do salutary harm to athletics for business. At one university the tennis courts, for four dollars, would not permit students to enter the enclosure to use the tennis courts during the football season. It took a brave president to counter the coach that the field belonged not to him, but to the state.

"Almost invariably the arguments of students in favor of intercollegiate athletics stress the business aims and ignore all others. 'Win games! Increase the gate receipts! Advertise the college! These are the usual slogans.

"It is when we rightly estimate the possibilities of athletics as education that the present system of intercollegiate athletics becomes intolerable. The call of today is for inexpensive, healthful and moderate exercise for all students, especially those who need it most. Colleges must sooner or later heed that call, and their athletics must be for education, not for business."
