OLD FIRS STILL GROWING

Experiment Shows Measurement In-

Results published in a recent issue of the Timberman relative to a forest service study of tree growth show that a certain typical stand of Douglas fir, about 60 years of age, on the western slopes of the Cascade Range in Oregon, has produced 5297 board feet during the last five years.

This is a specific test bearing upon a topic about which there has been much speculation. In April 1910, three sample plots, an acre each in size, were last during the fewers all acres and the sample plots. sample plots, an acre each in size, were laid out in a 54-year-old stand of Douglas fir second growth. Each individual tree was tagged and numbered and a record made of its measurements. This Spring, five years later, these plots were remeasured by the same methods. Some trees had died, others had stagnated, but the majority showed a growth of at least an inch showed a growth of at least an inch in diameter and a few as much as two inches. In fact, the average annual growth an acre was found to be 1259 board feet. This is gross, scale, no allowance being made for defects or allowance being made for defects or breakage.

It should be understood that this is not an exceptional stand in a favorable location. The conditions as to soil, cilimate and exposure are all average, and therefore the growth indicated is not in excess of what may be obtained on any good quality site on the Cason any good quality site on the Cascade foothills.
