RAIDERS INSIDE ISLANDS

Craft on Way to Attack England Stay Outside to Avoid Warning of Foes, but Disregard Rule on Return, is Charge.

LONDON, OCT. 16.—

How the regulations of The Netherlands prevent England from getting timely warning of the approach of Zeppelin airships is explained today by the Times' Amsterdam correspondent, who also refers to the "insolent violation of Dutch neutrality" perpetrated by Zeppelins returning from a raid on Great Britain.

THE DUTCH GOVERNMENT'S REGULATIONS

"The Dutch government's regulations," says the correspondent, "forbid the telegraphing to England of any warning unless the Zeppelins actually pass over Dutch territory or territorial waters. When they are only seen from the coast over the high seas, telegrams are detained six hours—sufficient time to make a friendly warning to England impossible."

THE DUTCH GOVERNMENT'S REGULATIONS

"Therefore, when going west, the Zeppelins are careful to keep outside of Dutch limits, showing plainly that they can do so if they wish. But, in returning, no penalty attaches to a violation of Dutch neutrality. Therefore, homebound-boat airships exhibit a total disregard of territorial limits. Today they flew inside the Dutch North-Sea Islands.

THE NETHERLANDS GOVERNMENT WISELY AVOIDS ANYTHING LIKELY TO PROVOKE A RUPTURE WITH GERMANY

but the feeling of the Dutch people is intensely bitter. They are especially angry because public should insist on an abrogation of the rule preventing telegraphic warnings."
