Dr George Frederick Kunz, Author of "The Magic of Jewels and Charms."

Felicity Crofton, by Marguerite Bryant. $1.35. Duffield & Co., New York City.

In this novel, in which quiet, family life in England is pictured with much restfulness and charm, our author has won credit for unusual and striking ability in the delineation of character.

The England that appears in these pages is the land of placid peace, so well known to the romantic woman novelist—quite different from the England of today, with every muscle strained for sacrifice and war.

Mrs. Crofton is a woman built for love, healthy thought and sacrifice, a woman who insists on fashioning her own life and facing her world bravely. Her one great, lasting love is for her daughter, Veronica, but she does not allow her love for her daughter to chill her sympathies for all who are in trouble.

Mrs. Crofton listens to the love story of her friend, Stella Forrester, who at 17 years old had made the mistake of falling in love with a man who, she afterward found, was already married. In her unhappy condition Stella went to see this man, but got no comfort. She was sent to Germany, but even foreign travel could not give her the power to forget.

"It is dreadful to be only 20 years old and feel that it is all over," said romantic Stella to her friend, Mrs. Crofton.

"But it's hardly begun," protested Mrs. Crofton. "You must never allow yourself to think that because you've made a mistake—more than a little—it's going to cast a dark on you all the time! If that were so, where would any of us be? We all make mistakes some time or other. The greatest mistake of all is to go on remembering it. Of course," she went on dreamily, after a little pause, in which Stella made a faint movement of her hands, dimly discernible in the dark—one had white and pretty hands—"of course, love is never trivial. It always stands for something in life, whether it's a mistake or not, as to the final result. Every time one falls in love, till the big thing comes along, one should find one's capacity for love deepen and widen. It's all going to school. Here and there one gets a soul with a genuine cry for love that needs no schooling, but springs to its pinnacle at once, but for most of us ordinary mortals training is necessary."

Most assuredly Stella was experiencing something new now, if she could recognize it. It was not the first time she had told her story, though she had never recited it in precisely those cold, dull words before; but it had never been received in quite this spirit, and the novelty was not displeasing.

"Most people believe one can only love once," she said doubtfully, she was not sure to succumb to Mrs. Crofton too readily, the most fatal mistake she sheltered in her role of sympathy heroine, that she would reap some advantage from a change of view.

"Most people are—stupid," laughed the other. "It would be a sad life for many if one could only love once. I am not speaking," she went on, with a deeper note in her voice, "of that love I call genius, but of that which falls to the lot of most of us mortals. God help us if we are only to feel it once in our lives. You'll fall in love again some day—oh, yes, you will. There are plenty of nice, honest, straight men in the world worth loving, and a very good touchstone of the worth of the love you have to offer them is whether in loving you find your heart opens wider to all the rest of the world, or shuts itself up and the man you love with it. If it does that, it's not genuine but spurious love. What you have to do is to stop thinking once and for all about what you call your mistake. It's done with. You have learnt something. Learnt, for example, that love can override all conventions. I suppose it was quite a rival thing, that love of yours, for the time. But don't take what's happened too seriously. Almost every woman you meet will have made a muddle over her love affairs some time or other. Either she hasn't recognized it, or she's missed it, or she's lost it. If we were all to sit down and think our life was ended because love for the moment had flown out of the window, it would be a dull world, I think," she added, heading forward and stroking Stella's arm gently, "that it was nice of you to tell me about it. Now make up your mind to bury it and never, never can you are beaten, because of one little experience."

Stella mumbled, as she followed Mrs. Crofton indoors, whether any particular meaning lay behind her words. Had she or had she not noticed Adam Preston's behavior?

These paragraphs are among the best of this English novel of self-sacrifice.

Germany's Violation of the Laws of War, 1914-15, translated by J. O. P. Bland. $2. G. P. Putnam's Sons, New York City.

Compiled under the auspices of the French ministry of foreign affairs, and based chiefly upon original French documents, this book is a terrific arraignement of the German methods of conducting the present war, principally in France and Belgium.

Our author states that "as a matter of deliberate and pre-determined policy, the German Government and the German army have persistently sanctioned the systematic violation of the Geneva and Hague Conventions. It is this all-important fact herein set forth and proved, which completely justifies the Allies in their proclaimed determination not to sheathe the sword nor to listen to any proposals of mediation, until the power of German militarism shall have been finally overthrown."

In short, our author presents the case and view of the French Government in this matter, and while the opinions will be acceptable to warriors and partisans of the Allies, it is certain that Teutonic allies in reading these pages will find room for disagreement. This is natural.

The charge is deliberately made that the German Government, having organized the dissemination of falsehood as a department of state, having made barefaced mendacity a branch of its public service, will not hesitate for a moment to repudiate and deny, as malicious inventions of the enemy, such proofs of German barbarism as may be produced, either by its victims or by sympathetic victims."

The chapter-heads: Violation of the Neutrality of Luxemburg and Belgium; Violation of the French Frontier, Before Declaration of War; The Killing of Prisoners and Wounded; Looting, Arson, Rape, Murder; Violation of the Geneva Convention; Use of Forbidden Bullets; Use of Burning Liquids and Asphyxiating Gases; Bombardment of Fortresses Without Notice, and of Open Towns; Destruction of Buildings Dedicated to Public Worship, Art, Science or Charitable Purposes; Treacherous Methods of Warfare, and Cruelties Inflicted on the Civil Population.

In a search for all sides of this disputed story, this courageous book is well worth while.

Morgan Robertson, the Man, illustrated. 132 pages. Metropolitan Magazine office, New York City.

As a story writer of high merit the late Morgan Robertson—he died March 24, 1915—was not so well known to his countrymen as he ought to have been.

Robertson was a natural wanderer, an Ishmael, and anything about his eccentric, unusual life is worth reading. His stories are unique and hold a place in American fiction that is all their own.

This book is a sort of memorial to Morgan Robertson and consists of different viewpoints by several writers, who met and knew Robertson when he first began writing. It presents a picture of New York Bohemia which is now nearly a memory of the past, like the literary spirits who made it—Robertson, O'Henry and others of that ilk.

The contents of this volume: Morgan Robertson, Shipmate; Gathering No Moss—an Autobiography; Sidelights on Morgan Robertson, by Seth Moyle; My Skirmish With Madness, by Morgan Robertson; Morgan Robertson, Hero, by J. O'Neill; The Art of Morgan Robertson, by Charles Hanson Towne; The Morgan Robertson I Knew, by Arthur T. Vance; The Psychic Mystery of His Time, by Henry W. Francis; Morgan Robertson, the Man, by Bozeman Bulger; Morgan Robertson, by Arthur B. Maurice; The Man I Knew, by Grace Miller White; Morgan Robertson's Famous Recipes.

About a year ago the Metropolitan, joining forces with McClure's, brought out a four-volume edition of Morgan Robertson's selected works. Morgan Robertson was penniless. He had written wonderful stories—stories that were destined to take their place in American literature—but he was a poor business man and he wrote before the days of fabulous prices for fiction. Squeezed dry, he was facing old age and poverty. The effort of the Metropolitan and McClure's was directed to giving him the recognition and reward due his genius. The plan was indorsed by such men as Booth Tarkington, Robert W. Chambers, Joseph Conrad, William Dean Howells, Rupert Hughes, George Horace Lorimer, Richard Harding Davis, Irvin Cobb, Robert H. Davis, Henry Reuterdahl, Arthur T. Vance, Rex Beach, Finley Peter Dunne. Morgan Robertson was found dead, standing up, looking at the ocean he loved, in Atlantic City, N. J., where he had gone to enjoy his first vacation.

The plan originally started on behalf of Morgan Robertson will be continued by the Metropolitan and McClure's for his wife, The royalties Mrs. Robertson receives will be her only source of income practically.

Morgan Robertson was a latter-day Edgar Allen Poe, Jr.

Empire and Armament, by Jennings C. Wise. $1.50. G. P. Putnam's Sons, New York City.

Typically a book for the present time, when need of military and naval defense interests the people. Our author is a specialist in military matters and was lately professor of political science and international law, Virginia Military Institute.

It is shown that the United States has become a great empire practically without having to fight for its expansion; that while history delights to picture Americans as being the most exclusive, amicable and just people in the world, as a matter of fact, "they have spoiled for a fight" on every occasion when it seemed advantageous to provoke one, and have officially meddled in the affairs of every country with which they have come in contact.

In arguing that it is time we got busy with National defense, our author suggests that the National Constitution be amended providing for the securing of competent, non-partisan Council of National Defense. We ought to have an Army of 250,000 men, we are told, with 50,000 men at the Panama Canal Zone and on our colonial possessions, and to maintain these men in a state of efficiency in times of peace it is thought wise to advocate the abandonment of "the expensive and strategically unnecessary Army posts scattered broadcast over the country."

My First Year of the Great War, by Frederick Palmer. $1.50. Dodd, Mead & Co., New York City.

"By the only official representative of the American press, with the British army in France, and selected by Lord Kitchener."

That significant paragraph best describes what sort of a book this is—the war in France and Belgium, as seen by a neutral American war correspondent. The book and its sympathies are, of course, in favor of the British allies in this war. Mr. Palmer is a graphic, rapid-fire, interesting writer who has stood the test of experience in reporting the incidents of several wars, and he writes with the trained ease of a veteran.

Mr. Palmer says that pictures of the German Crown Prince have been displaced in shop windows in Germany for pictures of Emperor William and Marshal Hindenburg. The spirit of France is well portrayed in the sentence spoken by many French soldiers: "We will die for France!" British and especially Canadian troops are highly praised, and quite a dramatic bit of writing is the story of the German "gas" attack in which the Canadian troops won renown. It is conceded, though, that the German army on and after Mons ought to have "got" the little British army, but didn't.

What Pictures to See in America, by Lorado M. Bryant. Illustrated. $2. John Lane Co., New York City, N. Y.

This is a mirror of American art, as viewed from the pictures seen in various picture galleries of America, from Boston to San Francisco. The lesson of the book is "See America first—in art."

It is stated that today it is possible to find in the museums of our various American cities paintings that form a consecutive history from Giotto through Fra Angelico, Botticelli, Raphael, Titian, Rubens, Rembrandt and Velasquez to the modern masters of European and American art. But in order to see art museums rightly in the short time at the disposal of the general tourist, a careful guide must be had to save time and strength. Mrs. Bryant throws many sidelights on the pictures of America and their painters, in descriptions, anecdotes and historic facts that make the traveler or the stay-at-home. Her 200 illustrations and pictures noted in the text form a splendid beginning for further study in the history of painting. It is shown that America stands today as the great treasure-house of the art of the world, and that her people through these art treasures must "stand for that broad intellectual and spiritual strength that will bring universal peace."

The Flower Art of Japan, by Mary Averill (Kwashikwai Kiyokumei). Illustrated. $1.50. John Lane Co., New York City.

An exquisitely fashioned book that will surely delight the lover of the beautiful in art, written by one that knows Japanese natural beauty intimately. Our author thinks that no other nation than Japan so genuinely loves flowers.

The Generation Between, by C. M. Matheson. $1.30. Brentano's, New York City.

Splendidly done. A love story of an unusual young woman, a story that will be remembered a long time for its lasting qualities.

Then I'll Come Back to You, by Larry Evans. $1.25. The H. K. Fly Co., New York City.

Steve O'Mara and his love story, depicting the big woods of the Southland. A novel of fine, healthy sentiment.

The Magic of Jewels and Charms, by Dr. George Frederick Kunz. Illustrated. $5. J. B. Lippincott Co., Philadelphia.

A review of this book appeared in The Oregonian of January 23.

HOWARD P. DREW equaled the world's record as a sprinter in a special 70-yard race in the Millrose amateur athletic games at New York. He made the distance in 7 1-5 seconds. Drew is a colored man. Another colored man, Roy H. Morse, came in second to Drew. Drew is entered in the Far Western track meet, to be held at Corvallis, Or., on April 1.

Alexander Graham Bell, inventor of the telephone, is at Palm Beach. Dr. Bell was born in Edinburgh, Scotland, in 1847. In 1871 he went to Boston, where he became professor of vocal physiology in the Boston University. He invented the telephone which is now in universal use and he received his patent on it in 1876. At the present time there are in use 14,888,550 telephones throughout the world.

John A. Dix, ex-Governor of New York, is looking for a job. Mr. Dix' business failed not long ago and he finds himself now without means of support. He has asked for an appointment in the Philippines and it is said the best that can be offered him there is at a salary of $3500 a year.

Because he elected himself chief "German baiter" in the House of Lords, Viscount Milner, who was Governor of Cape Colony from 1897 to 1901, has been made the center of attack by the British press. This German baiting finds very little sympathy among the British newspaper fraternity, especially so as it comes from a native-born German. To many people in Britain the disclosure of the birthplace of the Viscount comes as a great surprise. In all his biographic sketches the place of his birth has been omitted and it is now recalled that he never took his naturalization papers out. The Home Secretary says that by virtue of the statute of 1773, the grandson born abroad of a grandfather born in Britain was declared to be a British subject. Lord Milner's father, Dr. Charles Milner, came from Tuebingen, Germany.
