

MEDICOS' STRIKE IS STILL "GRAVE ISSUE"

Dean Mackenzie Does Not Regard Frog's Leap Contretemps Matter for Public.

FACULTY HEARING ASKED

Amphibian's Decision to Start Crusade "Back to the Marsh" Responsible for Row Between Instructor and Students.

The untimely leap of a frog that upset the gravity of the freshman class at the University of Oregon Medical School and started a strike because of a cutting remark of the instructor, Dr. John D. MacLaren, seems to have upset the faculty of the institution as well.

Answer Is Declined. What he would do in regard to this request he would not say yesterday.

Students at the University of Oregon Medical School, Twenty-third and Lovejoy streets, say Dr. MacLaren has not gotten so much from their physiology instruction as would be possible under another educational method.

Class Strike Continues. Pending the prayed-for action by the faculty, Freshmen are absenting themselves from Dr. MacLaren's classes.

The frog was a common, ordinary, run-of-the-marsh frog, at that. He was under observation in the marsh, at the school. Dr. MacLaren's class was studying the effect of light on the amphibian's skin.

The sudden jump startled the studious freshman, who also jumped. His fellows, with the vacuousness of youth, laughed. Then Dr. MacLaren jumped all over the freshman.

He declared a student should have better nerves, and that if he had not, the frog had more gray matter than the student. Relations were strained between the freshman and his instructor thereafter.
