The Life of William McKinley, by Charles S. Olcott. Two volumes, $5. Illustrated. Houghton, Mifflin & Co., Boston.

There is more than ordinary interest and pathos around the life and times of William McKinley, citizen, soldier, lawyer, legislator, statesman and President of the United tates. He passed to the other life in the same tragic manner as Lincoln and Garfield.

It has been estimated that next to Washington's and Lincoln's, the administration of President McKinley was probably the most important in the history of our country. That period marked the transition of the United States into a world power. Americans then faced, and face now, problems of international interest, particularly diplomatic relations with Europe, preparedness for war, results of the Spanish-American War, the future of Cuba, Porto Rico, and the Philippines and tarriff and currency questions. President McKinley's policies shaped many of these. His works live after him.

These two volumes are so admirable in scope, and treatment, and wealth of information, that they win for the work the title of "official biography." So very much material of the books are human. For the first time, the reading world becomes aware of President McKinley's love and extraordinary tenderness for his invalid wife, whose health became bad after the birth of their second child; of his habit of playing tricks on distinguished and haughty statesmen; of the man at play, as he smoked cigars and talked. Naturally, the volumes open with Mr. McKinley's ancestry and birth, and close with his death; caused by an assassin's bullet at the Buffalo Exposition, in September, 1901.

It is learned that Mr. McKinley once advised a friend to keep out of Congress. It was in 1884, when Mr. McKinley had been a member of the House of Representatives for seven years. "Before I went to Congress," he said, "I had $10,000 and a practice, worth $10,000 a year. Now, I haven't either."

Mr. Olcott was selected as author by agreement of the executors of Mr. McKinley's estate, George B. Cortelyou, the former Secretary to the President, and Justice William R. Day, who was Secretary of State during the Spanish War; and of Charles G. Dawes, formerly Controller of the Currency, a close personal friend. Mr. Olcott has had complete access to the wealth of material in possession of these gentlemen, and particularly the large store of official documents, personal and confidental letters, reports of long distance telephone talks, etc., which had been carefully collected for biographical purposes by Mr. Cortelyou, together with the personal diaries of Mr. Cortelyou and Mr. Dawes. He has also enjoyed close personal relations with many other friends of McKinley and with members of his family. In consequence, he has been able to produce what will remain the standard and authoritative biography based on full information and revealing for the first time the real McKinley.

These extracts from these two volumes are of notable interest:

McKinley rented an office in a building which is still standing, with an entrance a few yards from Market street, Canton, O. In the same building was the office of Judge George W. Belden, a Breckinridge Democrat and one of the most prominent lawyers in Canton, who, as United States District Attorney, had prosecuted some 80 professors and students of Oberlin College and put them in jail for assisting the escape to Canada of a fugitive slave. There was not much in this to commend him to a man of McKinley's ideas, but Judge Belden's attention was attracted by the busy young lawyer, whose industry was due to the zealous reading of law books rather than the preparation of cases. One evening Belden walked into McKinley's office and handed him some papers, saying that he was not feeling well and that he had a case that must be tried next morning, and wished McKinley to take it. The latter protested that he had never tried a case and could not prepare to do so on such short notice. Belden insisted that he should take it, however, and finally remarked bluntly as he laid down the papers and left the room: "If you don't try this case, it won't be tried." McKinley sat up all night preparing his argument and the next day appeared in court and won the cause.

While he was speaking, McKinley was astonished to discover Judge Belden sitting under the balcony in the rear of the room. Several days afterward the judge again walked into the young lawyer's office and this time smilingly extended his hand with $25 in bills. The inexperienced attorney hesitated. "I can't take so much," said he. "What I did wasn't worth it, and, besides, I only took the case because you insisted." After some further parley, during which the judge, with the money in his hand, was following the young lawyer around the room, Belden remarked, with a quiet chuckle: "It's all right, Mac. I got a hundred. Now, the fact of the matter is," he continued, "Frease has just been elected to the bench, and I'm looking for another partner. The flattering case was promptly accepted, and from that moment McKinley made steady progress at the bar.

* * *

An event in McKinley's legal career occurred in the Spring of 1876, which, though of little importance in itself, served to bring him still more prominently into public notice and is interesting because of the future relations of the persons involved. In March, 1876, a strike of coal miners was declared in the Tuscarawas Valley. The operators undertook to break the strike by collecting miners in Cleveland and vicinity and transporting them to a mine in Stark County, a few miles south of Massillon. The property was managed by Rhodes & Co., of Cleveland, of which firm Marcus A. Hanna was the leading member. It was operated by George H. Warmington, a partner of Mr. Hanna. In April a second gang of strike-breakers was sent to the mine, and arrived just while the strikers were at dinner. The cry of "scab" was instantly raised, and with a rush the strikers attacked the car, precipitating a general melee in which Mr. Warmington was assaulted and nearly killed. The whole city was thrown into a turmoil and the Sheriff was obliged to call upon Governor Hayes for assistance. A company of militia was sent to the scene and succeeded in quelling the disorder, but not until after the strikers had set fire to the mines belonging to Hanna's firm. Many miners were arrested and taken to Canton for trial.

With the public mind inflamed against the rioters, it was not easy for them to secure counsel. At length an appeal was made to McKinley. Upon investigation he found that many of the miners had been unjustly accused. He undertook their defense and pleaded so successfully that nearly all of them were acquitted. Realising that the strike had made them nearly destitute, he refused to accept payment for his services. The operators were represented by Lynch & Day, the senior partner being McKinley's former opponent as a candidate for Prosecuting Attorney, and the junior partner his lifelong friend and future Cabinet officer, William R. Day. It was Major McKinley's first experience with Mark Hanna, though the two were strangers at the time. It is curious that the man whose interest he was then so strongly antagonizing should later become his stanchest political supporter and an intimate personal friend.

* * *

There is no doubt that the section of the McKinley bill which attracted the greatest amount of attention was the proposition to increase the duty on tinplate. It was even more of a novelty after being amended than when it came from the hands of the committee. It was the first attempt ever made to legislate for the protection of an industry that had not been started; but it was quite unique to provide that the protecting duty should automatically repeal itself if the effort should not succeed.

It had been taken for granted for many years that tinplate could not be made in the United States. In 1873-75 attempts were made to manufacture it, but before the effort could be fairly started, the foreign makers crushed the threatened competition by reducing the price from $12 a box to $4.50. When the American mills were put out of existence the price was advanced to $9 and $10 a box. From that time until 1890 the Welsh manufacturers enjoyed a monopoly and fixed their own prices. In 1889 the importation amounted to 735,770,988 pounds, upon which, under the tariff law of 1883, a duty of over $7,000,000 was paid. This duty was a tax, for the price was fixed by the foreigner, which the American consumer, in the absence of competition, was obliged to pay, plus the duty.

Tin plate is simply sheet iron or steel, coated with tin. With the metals readily available, there seemed to be no reason why it could not be produced in the United States and the great growth of the canning industry was causing a steadily increasing demand. McKinley saw the opportunity and made careful investigations. He brought to the attention of Congress letters from capitalists who were ready to undertake the manufacture of tin plate at once if guaranteed adequate protection. McKinley said: "We have now four mills which can be at once adapted to making tin plate. They can produce about 4000 tons a year. It would require 90 mills of the dimensions of those now here to make the tin plate used in our country, and it would require over 25,000 men to be employed directly in this industry. But the benefits would not stop there. The additional labor in mining the coal and ores, in producing the pig metal, the lead, the tin, the lumber for boxing, and the sulphuric acid, would furnish labor to 50,000 workmen and bring support to 200,000 people. The capital required would be above $20,000,000. I know no more certain and encouraging field for labor and capital than is here presented. We have not hesitated, therefore, to recommend the advanced duty."

In the committee of the whole, the duty was fixed at 2.2 cents a pound instead of 1 cent as provided by the act of 1883. In the final vote on the tin-plate provision, it barely escaped defeat, being adopted by a vote of 150 to 149. Thomas, Senator, at the instigation of Senator Spooner, added an amendment providing that after 1897 all tin plate should be admitted free, unless the domestic production for some one year before that date should be diminished one-third of the importations during any one year from 1890 to 1896. The infant was thus guaranteed protection before he was born, but woe unto him if he should not develop into a healthy child.

Fortunately he did so develop. McKinley's faith was justified. The importation for the fiscal year 1896 was 385,138,983 pounds. One-third of that amount is 128,379,661, which was the minimum amount necessary to be produced to avoid the automatic repeal of the duty. The actual production for the calendar year 1897 was 574,779,520 pounds!

The succeeding Congress reduced the duty to 1.2 cents in 1894 without much protest, and the Dingley law raised it to 1⅛ cents the larger rate originally considered necessary to start the industry having been found excessive. The business continued to thrive, reaching its maximum in 1912, when the total importation of tin plate and terne plate in the United States, which before the McKinley law had been nothing, reached the total of 2,157,055,000 pounds. The imports, which were 735,779,988 pounds in 1889, were only 6,613,253 pounds in 1912, while the exports in the same year were 182,994,560 pounds. In 1914, instead of the four mills which McKinley announced as ready to begin the manufacture of tin plate, there were in actual operation 30 large plants, comprising 358 mills, and 13 more were in process of construction. Thus, by the operation of a wise piece of legislation, a great industry was transferred from Wales to this country. In less than a quarter of a century American mills were meeting a vastly increased demand for manufacturing the product nearly three times as great as the total importations of the year preceding the McKinley bill. The mills have since been reduced to a nominal amount, nearly all of which were re-exported, thus taking advantage of the drawback of 99 per cent of the duty paid. Nor did the tariff which brought about this important addition to American industry increase the price of the product. The average price of a box of tin plate in 1880 was $6.75; in 1889 it was $4.55. There was a slight increase in 1890, 1891, 1892, 1893 and 1894, during which time the industry was getting started, after which the price declined. In 1895 it was $3.87, and in 1898 it was as low as $2.99. Since then, with the exception of a single year (1900, when the price was $4.82), the price has been consistently lower than it was in 1889.

McKinley always made careful preparation for his speeches, and when he arose to speak the audience knew that he had "something to say." There was one amusing exception, however, when the reverse was true.

Charles F. Manderson, afterward a Senator from Nebraska and President pro tempore of the Senate, was in early life a resident of Canton. He was a fluent speaker and prominent in politics. On one occasion he and Major McKinley were advertised to speak from the same platform. It was Manderson's custom to go quite unprepared, depending upon the inspiration of the occasion to stimulate him off on some of his horsed-up eloquence. He had an excellent memory and experienced no difficulties in extemporaneous speaking. On the way to the meeting Manderson remarked, casually, "By the way, Major, I'm not prepared for this affair. In fact, I scarcely know what are the issues. Would you mind telling me what you are going to talk about?" The Major obligingly took out his carefully prepared address, and read it, commenting upon the various points. He had also prepared some statistics and other documentary proofs of his position. After going over the subject pretty thoroughly Manderson said, "Major, you've got this in pretty good shape, and I'm only going to speak offhand. Don't you think you'd better let me be the 'curtain-raiser' and lead off?" McKinley, of course, consented.

Manderson was introduced first, and after a few preliminary remarks started off on a speech which McKinley, to his astonishment, recognized as his own. As point after point was made and applauded by the audience, he fairly gasped as he began to realize that there would be nothing left for him except his statistics. The climax was reached when General Manderson, having captivated his listeners, concluded by saying: "And now, gentlemen, in proof of all I have told you, we have taken pains to collect some interesting figures and other documentary evidence, and (turning to McKinley) if my distinguished colleague will kindly hand me the papers which he has in his pocket, I will read them to you."

McKinley ever after kept his speeches to himself until they were delivered.

The Strange Case of Mason Brant, by Nevil Monroe Hopkins. $1.25. Illustrated. J. B. Lippincott Co., Philadelphia.

With four illustrations in color by Gayle Hoskins, we dip into a story book containing new detective mysteries of absorbing interest.

Here and there we may detect a hark back to the style of Sherlock Holmes, but only for a little bit.

There are three stories in the book: "The Mystery in the North Case," "The Moyett Case" and "The Investigation at Holman Square." In writing these Mr. Hopkins has shown surprising ingenuity and keen originality.

Take, for instance, the first story, "The Mystery in the North Case." The scenes are laid in London, England, during the course of the present war. Dr. James L. North, a famous oculist, is found dead in his study and apparently he had been murdered by some unknown person or persons. Mason Brant, the professional detective and sleuth is hired to discover the murderer and Brant is assisted in his investigations by his chum, Robert Dale. Here we have one kernel of the Conan Doyle's kind of criminal fiction —Sherlock Holmes and his chum, Watson. Brant is asked to help Miss Fairchild, of Philadelphia, who is known to have called on Dr. North sometime before he was found dead and it is known that the two had a violent dispute. The fussy London police, led by Inspector Williams, wish to arrest Miss Fairchild and they look upon Mason Brant as a meddler and pest.

Brant discovers that the body of Dr. North is in a chair, that his clothing consists of khaki field service uniform and that he met his death through a bad wound, evidently made with a heavy blunt instrument, discernible over his right temple.

The investigation proceeds.

The undertaker was about to place Dr. North's body in a coffin, when Mason Brant insists on making an examination. He finds on striking matches and looking into the area of the wound, that four letters appear luminous "A. M. O. H." There were "glowing lines in the wound" (page 34). The letters were about one-eighth of an inch in height and in character and appearance resembled the images in an old-fashioned daguerreotype.

What was the cause of the glowing letters in the wound? Radium. Brant discovers that several days before his death, Dr. North had been abusive and quarrelsome, an unusual condition for him. Dr. North and a brother physician, Dr. Henry Zirligon Phelps, had a bitter quarrel.

How the radium was applied by an enemy near the wound, how the intense heat robbed Dr. North of his reason, how death relieved him of his strange, unaccountable pain and how the scientific murderer is caught—behold! that is the best part of the novel.

Samuel W. McCall, Governor of Massachusetts, by Lawrence B. Evans. $1.25. Illustrated. Houghton, Mifflin Co., Boston.

Here we have an appreciative, worthy and well-written biography of a notable American, who has been mentioned more than once as a Presidential possibility. The pages of the book are 242 and the different pictures of Governor McCall are decidedly interesting. A notable portion of the book is where the record of Mr. McCall as president of Dartmouth College is furnished.

Mr. Evans, our author, was for several years head of the department of history and public law in Tufts College and is also a lawyer in Massachusetts. It is stated that the biography is the outcome of a friendship with Governor McCall, extending many years.

The Day of Wrath, by Louis Tracy. $1.25. Edward J. Clode, New York City.

Mr. Tracy has in writing "The Day of Wrath" presented word pictures of the invasion of the German army in Belgium, pictures that fairly glow in color and intensity. The methods of the German army are attacked. Charges are made of unprovoked murder of helpless and innocent Belgian citizens, charges of abuse and cruelty generally.

The time depicted begins in August, 1914. Captain Arthur Dabroy, of the British army, in company with Lieutenant Karl von Halwig, of the Prussian Imperial Guard, is speeding from Germany and is appealed to for escort and help by Lady Irene Beresford, a noted English beauty. Lady Irene was forced to leave Germany through the amorous attentions of a royal Prince. She asks Dabroy to help her to reach Brussels, Belgium, where her sister lives.

War duties call away Lieutenant von Halwig and Dabroy and Lady Irene become war fugitives. Dabroy organizes a small crowd of fighters and they battle with detached German outposts. Much blood is shed. The love story is an exciting one.

The Finding of Jasper Holt, by Grave Livingston Hill Lutz. $1.25. J. B. Lippincott Co., Philadelphia.

Miss Jean Grayson is a pretty girl with an established social position and Jasper Holt is popularly supposed to be a bad man, though he is a handsome one. The two young people meet in a railroad wreck and he saves her life and rescues her from peril. The neighbors say that Holt is a Western desperado and Jean has a difficult task in proving that Holt is a jewel in the rough. A novel of unusual interest and with quite a wealth of characters.

The Light Feet of Goats, by Shaemas O. Sheel. $1. Lawrence J. Gomme, New York City.

Forty-eight euphonious, high-class poems, many of them having first seen the light in such magazines as the Independent, Smart Set, Forum, etc. The poems are all serious, mostly somber, and nolt at all jocular. They do not run to the jingle variety.

"Knowledge means ever renewed assurance by defeat That victory is somehow still to reach. But love is victory, the prize itself."
