The Red-Whiskered Man.

WHAT a queer place for a rich man's relatives to live!" thought Christopher, looking up in a puzzled way at the tall, dilapidated house in the Jewish quarter of Amsterdam, in front of which he stopped Scarlet Runner.

Christopher, who by special arrangement and extra payment had brought the motor across from England on the night boat to the Hook of Holland, had spun along good clinker roads, bowling his car and his one passenger into Amsterdam in time for a late break-fast. That meal he had taken at a hotel, while his employer (unknown to him a few hours before) had driven off in a cab to the house of a relative, who was expected to join the party for a week's run through Holland. Instructions were that, after breakfast and a couple of hours' rest, Christopher was to call at a certain address.

Here he was, then, in front of the house, an ancient, secretive-looking building that nodded forward as if its time to tumble into ruln might come at any moment; and a vague suspicion of mystery in his errand suddenly stole into Christopher's mind.

The young man who had engaged him and the Scarlet Runner-the young man with the features, bearing and manner of an Englishman, the accent of Oxford, and the name of a Dutch-Van Cortlandt-had seemed frankness itself. He had insisted (as was a stranger to Christopher and the car was to be taken out of England) upon paying £50 in advance. He had been an agreeable companion dur-enough to make it safe to turn his head if he had had on his person the thing and give a quick glance behind to see! I trusted him to bring back to me." what thing had been thrown into the tonneau at the moment of his flight.
