Raoul Lufbery

It was on the race course at Calcutta, transformed temporarily into a flying field, that I made my debut in aviation, if so odd a beginning may be called a debut. One hot August day, in the year 1912, while I was strolling along the banks of the Ganges River, my attention was attracted by a great crowd of natives who were talking and waving their arms in the wildest excitement. Near by there was a little group of Europeans who were perhaps equally excited, but, after our Western custom, more restrained in their manner of showing it. I joined this gathering, curious as to the meaning of it. "The French aviators are coming," someone told me. Then others, eager to give information to a newcomer, pointed out a boat which was coming in to the shore. On the deck were two large yellow cases. "Do you see them? These are crates containing their machines. They are Bleriot monoplane." Shortly afterward the boat came to anchor and two young fellows, Marc Pourpe and Joseph Vermick, the aviators, disembarked and were received by their compatriots. The natives waited patiently while the enormous boxes were being carried ashore. Most of them had heard of aeroplanes, but they had never seen them, and their curiosity was aroused to the highest pitch. A crowd of a dozen or more coolie women, standing near me, were discussing this new event. I understood enough of their language to be interested and amused at their remarks. People of the world around are a good deal alike, and the skeptic in America who used to say, "No, sir! You can't tell me that them pesky things will ever fly!" had his counterpart in the crowd of Indians on the banks of the Ganges. Finally, one of them, a woman, more daring than the others, stepped forward and cautiously touched the tip of a forefinger to one of the boxes. "Funny bird!" she said, turning to
