AT THE HOUSEBOAT ON THE STYX The Amalgamated Brotherhood of Kings

(Copyright, 1918, by the McClure Newspaper Syndicate) Reported by Wireless to John Kendrick Bangs

"To Give Up, Gott for Git!"

He Used to Chute His Shop-Worn Harems Into the Bosphorus

"HOWDY, Lou?" said Benjamin Franklin, as Louis XVI, the ill-fated monarch of revolutionary France, came aboard the houseboat on the Styx the other morning and joined the illustrious party of deathless souls already assembled there.

"How is your ex-Royal Highness's exalted this morning?" said Louis.

"Bon—very bon indeed," said Louis.

"Fact is, Benji, haven't felt so bon a long time. If I were any bonner you'd have to screw me down to keep me from kicking Gibraltar off the face of nature. Why do you ask?"

"O, no reason in particular," said Franklin. "Only the king business is almost as new these days as the stock market, and I wondered how you chaps who still hold stock in the International Royalty Company were getting along."

"I don't bother about earthly stocks any more," said Louis. "I haven't even looked at a market report for going on a hundred years, and whether Royalties are up or down interests me not at all. I opposed the introduction of a ticker in this clubhouse when the project was first proposed by Midas and Croesus and Monte Cristo, and while I've overruled, I have been consistent with my principles and let the darn thing tick for all I cared."

"I am not surprised, Lou—that was always your principle," said Franklin. "You never were willing to listen to anything from the outside. If you'd let a daily hint from Wall street sliding through a ticker in the palmy days at Versailles, when you and Marie Antoinette were looking on life as nothing more than one glorious week-end after another, you might have staved off the catastrophe that cost you your head and made Napoleon Bonaparte possible."

"We had red tape enough at Versailles in all conscience, Ben, without introducing a couple of miles of white tape into the family circle every day," retorted Louis.

"That's just it," said Franklin. "Red tape was all you had, and it bound you hand and foot. But that little strip of white paper tape that you so despise would have bound you to nothing; but, on the contrary, might have freed you, simply by telling you what your courtiers didn't dare tell you, which way the market was going. If you'd had a ticker in the securities of the throne, you'd have taken care to put a few million francs in Hohenzollern common and sold out your Divine Rights preferred before the bottom fell out."

"O, well," said Louis sadly, "there's no use of crying over spilt crowns. It's all over now—done forever—and it doesn't add to the joy of Hades to go round moping over what might have been."

"Spoken like a philosopher, sir," said Marcus Aurelius. "If I had spent my time back in the old days writing aphorisms on the unhappiness of duty, and the gloom of life, where would I be as a household word today?"

"Correct," said John, sipping his sarsaparilla tonic through a straw. "Same here. All over the world several thousand years after my last carbuncle had bunched its way into nothingness to land upon the neck of oblivion itself, because of my patience under suffering, my name, too, is spoken with affection. Little children flap it with reverence, the middle-aged with pride, and the aged with awe. But who knows the names of my comforters, who'd have had me dead and buried before my time, had I yielded to their pessimistic lamentations? Nobody! They might have been Smiths, Browns, Joneses or Robinsons for all the world of today knows or cares. Even I have forgotten them."

"Nevertheless, John," said Franklin, "there is such a thing as preparing. It is well to be patient under suffering, but better still to think right at the proper time and to stave off trouble if you can. It is quite possible that if you had made a practice of taking a few doses of cod liver oil, and a liver pill or two before your carburetor began to carbonate you wouldn't have run down so far. If I see a carbuncle headed my way I don't run out and greet it as though it were a prodigal son and fall on its neck and tell it it was always my favorite uncle. No sirree! I get out the old medicine chest and mix up a bottle or two of old Doctor Franklin's anti-bunk, good for man or beast, and use it as an appetizer at every meal, with the result that the unwelcome visitor slides off in another direction and bunks on some other fellow's neck. A tip in time has saved many a vanished margin."

"The trouble with kings has always been that they wouldn't accept the tips," said Jeremiah. "Take Nebuchadnezzar for example. They even went so far as to scribble a straight tip to Neb on his dining-room wall; but the old boy came to grass in spite of it, because he wouldn't take it."

"I didn't know it was a tip," said Nebuchadnezzar. "I thought that hand-writing on the wall was the work of a party of Cook's tourists that had just passed through, and ordered it washed off. Besides, kings should be above tips. You can give a tip to a barber, or a hat-check boy, or a bootblack, but not to a king."

"Quite right," cried Don Quixote. "What is the difference between a king and a Pullman porter?"

"Easy," said Solomon. "One looks after his own, the other looks after the berth-rights of other people."

"That isn't the answer," said Don Quixote. "The answer is that kings don't take tips."

"Fairly good, fairly good," said Franklin. "Send it to Bosphorus for his joke column, Quixy. Say Johnson said it and he'll give you a dollar for it. In the meantime, about this king business. It's on the toboggan today, all right, and for the self-same reason that Louis the Sixteenth and Charles the First lost out—kings won't take tips from the ticker every day, they are so morning's quotations in the market report of the 'Gehenna Gazette,' as reported from over the River. Russian Czar, quoted two years ago at 25 1/2, now in the hands of a receiver; Greek Kings, worth a trifle less than par eighteen months ago, now offered at a half of one-eighth per cent, and no takers; Emperors of Austria, gilt-edge five years ago, as shabby today as a second mortgage bond on a Bolshy; and the ages, invested in by Kaisers, Kaiserettes, Kaiserines, Junkers and all sorts of Teutonic rag-tag and bob-tail, guaranteed by the personal word of Bill himself, its shares have fallen from 35 1/2 to 2 1/2, with 'Bill' himself reported to be quietly selling short."

"O, well, what of it?" said Louis.

"Who in Hades cares?"

"O, nobody much," laughed Franklin. "Only it shows which way the wind is blowing, and proves that if Kings, Kaisers, Emperors and Czars would only be wise enough to take tips from the ticker they'd have their cyclone cellars built and a few corrugated steel umbrellas handy for the rainy day ahead."

"You foresee wet weather for kings?" said Jeremiah.

"Surest thing you know, Jerry," said Franklin. "The deluge that was Paris Fourteenth is now rolling across Bill and his pals, and when the day comes you'll hear 'Bill sings, that blainive little lyric—"

It is not raining rain for me,
It is raining daffodils.

"O, well," interjected Baron Munchausen, "a daffodil or two isn't going to hurt the Kaiser much. It'll take something more than a daffodil to get through a coat of mail, doesn't the town?"

"Ah! but in this case, Munch, the daffodil will be only a figure of speech," said Franklin. "Bill will sing a revised version of the lyric, running something like—"

It is not raining rain for me,
It is pouring shell and shot.
And, bitzen, overhat!
A cloud of bombs obscures the town,
Surcharged with deadly gas,
And through the bus the clouds let down
A virilious mass.

It is not raining flowers at all,
But missiles round me fill,
And on all sides I hear 'em fall.
To give up Gott for git!

"What's H-2-S-O-3?" demanded Munchausen.

"It's poetic license for H-2-S-O-4," said Franklin. "And H-2-S-O-4 is the formula for sulphuric acid—a nice little chemical compound that can eat and digest anything."

"Sort of a liquid goat, I imagine," said Samson. "Gee, wouldn't it be awful if it should ever rain goats?"

"It sure would, Sampy," laughed Franklin. "Far worse than the proverbial cats and dogs. But I have a feeling way down in my bones that, ficker or no ficker, Bill has got his weather eye open, for he's just read in an American newspaper that he has written a letter to one of his fellow posterates that they've all got to stick together or be put out of business. That's rather like Bill, too—quite Teutonic—to take something somebody else has said and try to pass it off as his own. Back in seventeen seventy-six, when Tom Jefferson and I got up the Declaration of Independence to send over to another 'Deutscher Boy' who happened to be asleep at the British Switch, I myself made the remark that we signers would have to hang together or we'd all hang separately."

"He's trying to get up a sort of Amalgamated Brotherhood of Kings, eh?" said Caesar.

"Yep," said Franklin. "A sort of Potentates' Union, and no scab kings allowed on earth. Nobody allowed to reign anywhere without a union card, not a bad idea if it were designed to make better kings, but in this case of no more value than a union of pirates or second-story men who'd 'ave."

"I hardly give you the benefit of Bill's call, though," said Caesar. "The only kings he is inviting to join, as I understand it, are himself and the Sultan of Turkey and the Emperor of Austria and the King of Bulgaria, and judging from the letters they are all writing each other every day, they are so overlying stuck on each other already that it seems like piling an Omsk of Cement on a Pelion of Glue to call for a closer compact."

"All camouflage, all camouflage," said Franklin. "They don't mean a word of it, and Bill's on to the fact. The love-letters of these potentates may be sticky in their slobber of sentiment, but there's no real love lost here, and the Sultan of Bulgaria knows that Bill's bootblack has more real influence with Wilhelm than he has; the Sultan of Turkey is a highly oriflammé front and his waving plumes of powder are all show, and that he has dropped kingship for good and has become nothing more nor less than a politician; and the Sultan of Bulgaria knows that Bill's bootblack has more real influence with Wilhelm than he has;
