American And French Labor United.
Albert Thomas. Samuel Gompers

WHEN ALBERT THOMAS, labor representative of France, greeted Samuel Gompers, the American labor representative, just before the opening of the inter-allied labor conference in London, two of the world's most prominent labor leaders brought the men and women of France and the United States they represent closer together.

President Wilson walked the entire line of march in New York City's Liberty day parade. A traffic policeman offered his horse to the executive, but the President smilingly declared: "I'll walk. If I rode someone might think I was trying to put on lugs."

Mrs. Mary Hatch Willard, president of the surgical dressing committee of New York, has been awarded the gold medal by the French government for her work in fighting epidemics. She is credited with arousing the women of America to the necessity for surgical dressing supplies.

Nurses have been mobilized as rapidly for service overseas as have soldiers for Pershing's forces. Their work at the front has won the hearty praise of the American commanding General. Upon disembarking overseas they march in columns, led by their colors, to their new stations.

Palestine virtually was cleared of the enemy when the victorious army of General Allenby entered the city of Damascus. Straight street, covered by a long-arched roof, is the widest thoroughfare in the city, and the only roofed one in the world. British soldiers now are marching up and down this street.

The small tank has demonstrated its worth during the recent allied advances. The "babes" have helped smash the Hindenburg line and now are considered almost indispensable to an infantry advance. American tank crews are operating them.

Hundreds of Serbian orphan children have been sent to England. They arrive in London, where they are welcomed at Waterloo station by Sir Charles Wakefield and the wife of the Serbian Minister and then are sent to homes in the country districts of England.
