

SUFFRAGE VICTORY ENDS FIGHT IN IDAHO

Women Press Passage of Anthony Amendment.

BORAH'S STAND OPPOSED

Leaders Attribute Prosperity of State to Removal of Saloon, Formerly Big Political Issue.

BOISE, Idaho, June 7.—(Special.)—Passage by congress of the Susan B. Anthony amendment, giving equal rights to women, has a decidedly stimulating effect on the women of Idaho. Suffragettes of Idaho have played no unimportant part in obtaining favorable action at the national capital. Idaho has enjoyed suffrage as a state since 1896. Women in this state have had the equal right of franchise and have proved a powerful influence in molding public sentiment and opinion. The Idaho legislature at its next regular session will unquestionably ratify the federal amendment. While that state declared they were not going to take any chance, but would proceed immediately to organize and pave the way for ratification by a unanimous vote of the solons.

Borah Fight Recalled.
For a time women of the state were divided over the suffrage issue because of the methods pursued by the two different factions, one of which was militant and the other opposed to any act bearing upon radical action. The militants last fall sought to defeat Senator Borah at the general election. The women of the state were divided over the attacks made on him. Senator Borah to the last refused to recede from his stand. He voted against the amendment resolution on final passage. Senator Nugent, democrat, also from this state, voted for the resolution. He was pledged from the first to its support and passage. Both of Idaho's representatives, Burton L. French and Addean T. Smith, supported the amendment in the house.

Passage Pleases Leaders.
"We are glad that the Susan B. Anthony amendment has been passed by congress and have no criticism to offer," said one of the leading suffrage leaders of the state, "and securing the success of the amendment. Senator Borah was quite within his rights to refuse to be moved from his position on the state right to support the amendment. I am more inclined to admire him for the stand he maintained against the pressure brought against him than I am to criticize him for not supporting the amendment. We have been successful before congress and will be just as successful in getting the amendment through legislative enactment."

Politically speaking, the action of congress removes forever from mooted issues in this state the suffrage question. For years prohibition played a greater part in politics than did suffrage.

Prohibition Is Liked.
The fact that the nation is slated soon to go dry is not worrying the people of Idaho. The saloon will never again be permitted to operate in this state, the women declare. The most radical "wet," the most bitter opponents of local option and statewide prohibition are today in Idaho its most ardent champions. Even the bootlegger is finding it so dangerous to continue in the illicit traffic that he is departing for other fields. The present prosperity of the state, even political leaders, is due largely to the enactment of prohibition legislation. The activity of federal officials, coupled with the putting into effect of the law enforcement department of the new state government, has made the moonshine business decidedly dangerous. Most of the liquor "leaks" into Idaho along the Idaho-Nevada boundary, but these will be plugged through the recent action of the supreme court of that state in holding constitutional the prohibition law which the electors of Nevada have ratified.

Idaho party leaders, and particularly women, who have been conspicuously active in both the suffrage and prohibition fights, view with a degree of satisfaction the effect of the passage of the suffrage and liquor questions. In the directing of party affairs in the future they are confident that neither issue will cut much figure in the campaign.
