Enthusiasm Not Sufficient. Now, it is not enough that a man begins his task enthusiastically. Enthusiasm is a good and necessary thing. All the world's greatest enterprises have been passionately initiated...

PATIENT CONTINUANCE HELD SECRET OF ALL SUCCESS

Sermon by Dr. William T. McElveen of Manhattan Congregational Church, New York City, Now in Portland.

PORTLAND is having the opportunity this month to hear six sermons by Dr. William T. McElveen of the Manhattan Congregational church...

One of his sermons which has attracted a great deal of favorable comment was on "Patient Continuation in Well-Doing." He took for his text Isaiah 41: "To them that wait patiently, continuance in well doing shall bring forth glory and honor and immortality, eternal life."

keeps us plodding until we get it we get it. We get it, and everything upon which we set our hearts. If we are willing to earn results we may have what we will.

Perhaps we had better define and describe this recompensing excellency. Patient continuance means doing a good thing and then doing it again and again, and then doing it yet again and again. It means the courage to try to do a thing we know to be good before we really know how to do it well; the persistence to keep on doing it better and better, after we have found out how to do it and then the steadfastness to untriflingly renew the faithful doing of that good thing day after day in the ultimate triumph of good to be a meeting for men, with movies and music.

label for the idea that Paul calls patient continuance in well doing. It is the name which lazy people give to the faculty by the exercise of which constant people earn results, while the lazy people are sleeping or putting off, or denying that they could gain it without toiling for it.

Goethe a Prodigious Worker. Goethe was a prodigious worker. We know him as a poet, but he was also an investigating scientist, a speculative philosopher, a superintendent of public works and a director of a theater at the same time. There are a hundred volumes in the Weimar edition of his works. How did he do it all?

to be scared to death by it. And to die of overwork is not the most inglorious of ends. I'd be ashamed to die if I spent the major part of my time dodging work, or postponing work, or wishing someone else would do what I should do, or in hoping that the lapse of time would make it unnecessary for me to do the work.

Worry is Always Folly. We call Napoleon a military genius, but what was the real inwardness of his military ability? When Napoleon was a boy at school, one day his teacher gave the class a mathematical problem which no pupil could solve. Indeed, the teacher was unable to work it out.

ing one's life; but not using is losing. The man who wrapped his talent in a napkin and buried it in the ground had it taken away from him. Coleridge had talent. Few men had more wonderful man he knew. Carlyle referred to him as "The myrrid-minded man." But the great experimenter in the realm of the public was Alfred Russel Wallace. Perhaps because opium had enfeebled his will, because his reason and shattered his nerves he worked not steadily and cumulatively, but by fits and starts...

Continuance Brings Greatness. Often men who are not great by original endowment become great by influence and achievement because they possess and exercise this virtue of continuance. You may at first possess but little native power, but if you are always exerting it in order to become a great deed. The effect of an act depends less upon its size than upon the number of times it can be repeated and duplicated. There is plenty of chance for small talent if it is not too much in a hurry. An ordinary man can do as fine or as large a thing as a superior man, but he can do it oftener. He can keep on doing his little deed until it accomplishes as much as the one great deed. Twice ten is twenty; yes, but ten times two is also twenty. Ten times doing the smaller act will equal twice doing the larger act.

favor. Religion begins as a passion. So did art; so did literature; so did all fine things. So it is good to be zealously affected toward any good thing. But zeal needs to be yoked up with industry. It is not enough to be passionately initiated; it is to come to glorious completion. The objection to depending on enthusiasm alone is that it is not always to be depended on. It often goes up like a flashy skyrocket, but comes down like a burnt stick. Enthusiasm is not always reliable. It cannot always be harnessed and reined for a long, hard pull. It will do a good deal at first, but cannot be counted upon for steady efforts. It is not difficult to keep it kindled. It is difficult to keep it from being extinguished. It is not enough to feel good; you must be and do good continuously and cumulatively.

The conclusion of Dr. McElveen's sermon was an application of the principles thus unfolded. "This church," he said, "will grow in membership and in influence, not by religious innovations and novel and unique ways of doing things, but by keeping steadily at it. Some men acquit themselves from doing their pledged duty, but it is only by every member of the church doing his little, and doing it repeatedly and then bunching all these little things into one great thing, that this church will realize all its possibilities."
