Artificial Rate Readjustments Cannot Permanently Limit Distributive Business to Own Territory.

BT W. D. B. DODSON. ve Secretary of the Portland Cham-ber of Commerce.

Executive Secretary of the Partiand Cham-be of Commerce. Portland may reach the four corners of the Pacific northwest with prac-tically no grades for land transporta-tion lines. In one direction we reach Puget sound after traversing a nomi-nal divide. On the south the district stratches to the Siskiyou range, on a valley-haul line. To the westward Salt Lake City may be reached without elimbing a mountain range, when rail lines operate up the Snake river or detour through central Oregon. To the northeast the "Portland grade" reaches to the heart of British Columbia and into extreme northern Idaho. These grades for the first railways built reflect the routes of primitive commerce. Cances and overland cara-built reflect the routes of primitive commerce. Canoes and overland cara-vans followed the lines of least resist-ance. These lines from throughout the northwest led to Portland. Primitive commerce of the northwest was to Portland. The white man's first north-Fortland. The while has his his though Portland. First rallway construction was to and from Portland. First trad-ing companies and first mining cen-ters traded with and through Portland. Enjoying this primary advantage, Portland became firmly established as a great distributing conter. It retains this position today. Its older firms reached into the most remote sections of the northwest. Younger firms es-tablishing here followed this lead. While numerous rall-rate readjust-ments of recent years have tended to limit Portland's distributive business, the inherent strength of the city's posi-tion and the momentum of success have fought sternly artificial influences and ought sternly artificial influences and will forever establish the city for all time as the greatest distributive center of the whole Facific northwest. This trend is already apparent and with de-

One advantage given by nature to Portland as a distributive center has not been possible of full realization unfil very late years. This advantage is the delivery and taking of traffic from here by regular-line deep-sea steamships. Owing to the delays en-countered for two decades at the mouth of the Columbia river, because draff of vensels had exceeded channel depths, Portland was seriously handicapped in developing fully that portion of its disversels had exceeded channel depths, Portland was seriously handicapped in developing fully that portion of its dis-tributive business which depended upon this form of transportation. With completion of the two great stone jettles at the mouth of the Co-lumbia a little more than three years ago, at a cost aggregating $16,000,000, stable and permanent channel condi-tions were stained. Since that time the channel has deepened and widened annually, until it is now 42 feat for a numbit of 7000 feet, and 35 feet for a width of 7000 feet, and 35 feet channel than moet great ports of the sate year for some time in the future. This improvement has opened wide the gateway to the Columbia basin for the gateway to the improvement enables Port-land to base her distributive business fully moon the low rates of deep-sea fully moon the
