FRUIT THAWING POSSIBLE

POMOLOGY PROFESSOR EXPLAINS PROCESS.

W. S. Brown of Corvallis Says Frozen Apples Can Be Made Available for Market.

OREGON AGRICULTURAL COLLEGE, Corvallis, Dec. 20.—(Special).—Much of the frozen apple crop of the Pacific northwest can be saved and either used locally in butters and marmalade, or, if not too badly broken down, marketed through the usual channels, said W. S. Brown, professor of pomology at the college. The seriousness of the injury depends upon whether the protoplasm was killed or merely moisture exuded. If the freeze was so hard as to kill the protoplasm, nothing can be done with the fruit but throw it out.

Other factors that help determine the possibility of saving the frozen apples are the degree of ripeness and manner of thawing out. Very ripe fruit was said to have suffered much more than greener fruit, and rapid thawing, especially in a dry atmosphere, increases the amount of injury. Recommendations by Professor Brown are as follows: Do not handle the frozen apples unless it is necessary to truck them into a chamber where thawing conditions are under better control. Watch process carefully and keep temperature low and moisture plentiful. Sort over the fruit at the end of a week, throwing out all that are soft, withered and off flavor. Save the firm, unwithered fruit of normal flavor and market it as early as possible. The price probably will be out a little on this line because of the greater risk in handling. Fruit that is only slightly damaged may be worked up into butter or marmalade in the community, but is not recommended for cider.

MOSIER MEN KILL COUGAR

Animal Measuring 7 Feet Slain on Little Mosier Creek.

MOSIER, Or., Dec. 20.—(Special).—Stanley Miller and Webb brothers of Mosier killed a large cougar several miles south of town on Little Mosier creek Friday. The men had seen the animal Thursday while going through the timber after work. They shot once at it, but having no dog to aid them, had to give up the chase. They returned to the scene early Friday and treed the big fellow with the aid of an Airedale dog in about an hour's time. They soon dispatched him and upon measuring found he was about 7 feet from tip to tip.
