The course is a full one, extending over a period of six weeks, with the days crammed with lectures, practical work and the other courses.

This Americanization center is doing a work different from that carried on in other organizations, for it has for its basic idea the teaching of the woman of foreign birth and speech at home, thus reaching with the Americanization training the mother of little children, kept at home by her household cares, and bringing to her the same opportunity for learning to understand the country of her new home that her husband and her children enjoy in the shop and in the public school.

The course is offered free to those who wish to undertake it and there are no entrance requirements except an education sufficient to do the work, to understand the lectures and to grasp the fundamentals of sociology and psychology which are necessary to the full comprehension of the courses. Information may be had from the director of the center, Mrs. Culla J. Vayhinger, 1638 Blue Island avenue, Chicago, Ill.

From Baker, Pendleton and The Dalles on the east; from Astoria on the west and from Roseburg and Ashland on the south came delegates who journeyed to the annual conference of the Daughters of the American Revolution which closed its session at Salem last Saturday, making, with the large contingent of Portland Daughters, almost 1000 in attendance. This larger number of delegates, representing a broader territory with deeper interests and more intense patriotism, gave a more serious tone to the proceedings than had ever before been experienced.

In the beautifully decorated halls of the state house, amidst flowers, trailing vines and historic flags, the opening exercises were most impressive as the official party, officers, distinguished guests, regents, pages and hostesses came slowly down the aisle while music marked the time and the delegates stood at attention. "America" was sung, the flag was pledged and the invocation offered, after which Mrs. John Keating, state regent, declared the convention opened for business.

The order of business had been carefully planned at a previous board meeting thus saving time in useless discussion, and making the quick and decisive and business-like manner of disposing of questions to the satisfaction of every one, one of the marked features of the convention.

The entire session, even including the social functions, was devoted to business. The reports of the officers and committees covered a wide range of activities, indicating the strength and vitality of the organization, and its enthusiastic devotion to patriotic service. It was shown that special strength is being laid upon night schools for foreigners, and home teaching in carrying out Americanization work. Several chapters in the state have made themselves responsible for teachers and equipment. With the home teachers law, just passed by the legislature, the D. A. R. feel they have a definite policy to follow, and an effective mode of procedure.

The programme throughout was inspiring. Mrs. Mary Barlow Wilkins gave a comprehensive outline of the old trails, illustrating with maps and charts the national programme for preserving and marking the paths followed by the pioneer history makers. Following Mrs. Wilkins came a report and discussion of historical markers, five of which will be erected the coming year.

Miss Anna Lang of The Dalles, will erect a marker for her grandmother who was a real daughter. Mrs. C. S. Jackson of Portland, asked permission to erect a marker on the Clackamas river on the old historic trail. The D. A. R. of the state will mark the place of old Fort Clatsop.

Luncheons and dinners were reserved for the discussion of ways and means for conducting the work of the coming year. At the closing lunch on Saturday, Mrs. Thornburg Ross read a paper on "Historical Towns and Places in Oregon," which contained valuable information and required in its preparation original and painstaking research. Mrs. Esther Allen Jobes' report on Americanization work was replete with results in the past and suggestions for future work. It was so impressive that every delegate must have carried home with her some of Mrs. Jobes' energy and devotion to her foreign neighbors.

This was an "Oregon made" convention from start to finish, and all arrangements, planned and executed so beautifully by the hostess chapter at Salem, were done with this in view. Oregon music, flowers, place cards, food and loganberry punch were Oregon products.

The next annual convention will be held in Portland and will be the guests of Multnomah and Willamette chapters, with the president-general, Mrs. Minor, the guest of honor.
