Henry E. McGinn, Portland attorney discusses the Harding plan from the standpoint of the English question of disarmament. "The change in Eng-land's commerce amounts to a social and industrial revolution." he said. and industrial revolution," he said,
"and the statesmen of England are fully cognizant of the change."
He said the old state of affairs under which the colonies produced the raw materials and shipped them to England for manufacture was passing England for manufacture was passing and the possessions were manufacturing more and more from their own materials every year. The change of feeling among the colonists he also commented on, believing that there was as much of a kindred spirit felt for America and what she stands for as there is for the mother country. The mother instinct is still strong, he said, but England is beginning to acknowledge the rights of her colonies and correspondingly decreasing acknowledge the rights of her colonies and correspondingly decreasing her surveillance over them.

Judge McGinn said the American conscience was the most valuable adjunct of the move for disarmament. The world looked to that conscience for guidance and would be guided by it. The good faith of the nations and the sincerity of their approval he held at full value, because the world is ready for permanent peace and the cessation of warfare.

England Gains Confidence. "What effect will the conference have on the renewal of the Anglo-Japanese treaty?" Judge McGinn said the supremacy of the English-speaking peoples would never let the treaty react against the United States. Safety was assured this country, he clear to Secretary Hughes and a good many other people all along, that the only possible way to secure peace among nations is by mutual agreement; that is to say, by a league of nations, whether we call it by that name or some other. It is a beautiful example of the irony of fate that a proposal for a conference on naval disarmament by three nations, made by the most bitter of the 'irreconcilables' has gradually and inevitably enlarged itself into a conference by all the principal allied and associated nations and others, not only on naval disarmament, but on general disarmament and probably other international questions; and this through the action of a president who has committed himself by words, but happily never by deeds, to an uncompromising hostility to any real and effective league of nations.

Trifle Cause of War.

Trifle Cause of War. "As this conference works out it can hardly fall to include also many other nations. The history of the late war has shown that a quarrel with an obscure country on a trivial matter can just as well inflame the world as can just as well inflame the world as one arising between two great nations, and anyhow the fate of the holy alliance between Russia. Austria and Prussia sufficiently demonstrates that peace cannot be imposed upon the world by will of the great nations. There can be no reasonable doubt but that the logic of events. nations. There can be no reasonable doubt but that the logic of events will guarantee the sincerity and carnesiness with which the desired end is sought by all the participants, and bring about a league of nations sooner or later. The credit—and it will be the great and lasting credit due to one of the gupreme benefactors of the human race—will fall where it belongs."

Pence Necessity Stressed.

William L. Wheelwright stressed the necessity of all nations making the required concessions in order to bring about a satisfactory disarmament programme. The sincerity of all concerned in their expressions of approval could not be doubted he maintained, expecially in view of the fact that disarmament, from current indications, would not interfere with national development in any case. He further said:

"With Judge Carey, I have the greatest hopes of good results, but we must bear in mind that no one nation can enter a conference in which the rights of all nations must be considered with any hope of a satisfactory conclusion unless it is willing to make some concessions on its part. This I am quite sure the United States, if properly represented, will be ready and willing to do."

Federal Judge Robert S. Bean declined to make a lengthy statement of opinion, but expressed himself heartily in favor of the president's move and certain of its feasibility. He likewise considered the expressions of approval and willingness to participate on the part of the different nations entirely in good faith.
