BY HUMAN PARKER.
A young man some years ago left the business in which he had spent most of his life, and after a season of travel abroad, went to the Boston home of a dear old lady who had helped him in his early years. She was a bit of a sinner, led astray in early life, but who, after a long struggle, had managed to turn her life around, and who had been a benefactor to many a poor and needy person. The young man wanted to help her, and so he took up the idea of running an auction sale of old furniture and other household goods, and would do so every Saturday afternoon. He would sell the goods in the yard of the old lady's house, and it would be a sort of a community sale, and the money raised would be given to the poor.

But the people of the neighborhood did not like the idea of an auction sale in the yard of the old lady's house, and they complained to the police, and the police came and said they could not have an auction sale in the yard of the old lady's house, and they had to move the sale to another place.

But the young man was not to be deterred, and so he went to the old lady and said he would have to move the sale to another place, and the old lady said she would go with him, and she would help him in the sale, and she would help him in the planning of the sale, and she would help him in the collection of the goods.

And so the young man and the old lady went to a lot of places, and they collected a lot of goods, and they had a sale in a lot of places, and they raised a lot of money, and they gave the money to the poor.

And the people of the neighborhood said, "Why, we never knew that the old lady had such a good heart.

And the young man said, "Oh, yes, she has a good heart, and she has a good heart, and she has a good heart."
