'Is Jane Lonesome?'

A Play in Three Acts
By the author of "The Midnight Shift"

Time: Middle of the morning—an early winter day.
Place: Jane's room.

Act I
The curtain rises. Seated by a window in a stiff, old invalid chair is a child, and a first look convinces us that she is no ordinary child. We marvel at her glowing head of tangled auburn hair, contrasting so vividly with the pretty but unmistakably sad countenance beneath it. Again we marvel—she reads—the curtain falls.

Act II
With the rising of the curtain we see our little girl studying a pamphlet, her brows knitted, her position unchanged. She appears oblivious to a companion who is sitting in another part of the room studying her intently. "Jane, dear," remarks her companion, "why are you so sad? You'll soon be well and strong and out again, almost before you know it. Can it be that you are lonesome?" We ponder, we guess, but this question is not answered, for the curtain falls.

Act III
The opening of the final act finds the two girls still in conversation. "How you misjudge me, Carol," Jane remarks. "How could I be lonesome with such companions as these near me day in and day out?" She points to a long row of books, and in its mind's eye the audience can picture each volume smiling back at Jane its humble appreciation of her tribute. "If I look worried," she continues as a smile finally breaks its way across her sad features, "it is because I can't decide which of the fascinating new books in this pamphlet to send for today at
