They're a Reception Committee That Welcomes Ships to a Safe Harbor

BY DEWITT HARRIY

A PLACES among the busy life in port that draw the Columbia river when the town is busy is the local tavern. Nowadays, not only do they serve the ships, but they also serve the sailors who lay over in the town for a short time. The local taverns have become a welcome place to the sailors, who find them a comfortable place to rest and clear their minds of the strains of their work. The local taverns have become a place where the sailors can find food and shelter, and where they can relax and enjoy the company of others. The local taverns have become a symbol of hospitality and welcome to the sailors who lay over in the town.
