WELLS ARTICULATE MAN OF MASSES, SAYS SIDNEY DASK

His Genius Compels World to Listen and His Voice Is That of Super-man in Street, Declares Editor.

(From "An Outline of Wells" by Sidney Dask, editor of John O. London's Weekly.)

INTELLECTUALLY, of course, H. G. Wells is immensely superior to the common run of men. He is a born leader and inspirer of men and this is the point of outstanding importance—he remains a man of like passions with ourselves. Shaw and most of the intellectuals belong to a class apart. They generally recognize their separation from the crowd and glory in it. The intellectual habitually stands at the street corners and thanks God that he is not as other men. The glory of Bunyan and Charles Dickens is that they stood at the street corners and thanked God that they were as other men.

Wells has many affinities with Dickens. He does not possess Dickens' glorious humor. He has never been able to realize that even in mean streets life may have its thrills, but he belongs essentially, as Dickens belonged, to the English lower middle class. Wells is an articulate man of the people. And and their parents were all dead before I was born.

"My mother was the daughter of an inn keeper at a place named Midhurst, who supplied post horses to the coaches before the railways came; my father was the son of the head gardener of Lord de Lisle at Penshurst Castle, in Kent. They had various changes of fortune and position. For most of his life my father kept a little shop in a suburb of London, and eked out his resources by playing a game called cricket, which is not only a pastime but a show which people will pay to see, and which, therefore, affords a living for professional players. His shop was unsuccessful, and my mother, who had once been a lady's maid, became, when I was 12 years old, housekeeper in a large country house.

Shop Found Unsuccessful.

"I, too, was destined to be a shopkeeper. I left school at 13 for that purpose. I was apprenticed first to a chemist, and, that proving unsatisfactory, to a draper. But after a year or so it became evident to me that the facilities for higher education that were and still are constantly increasing in England, offered me better chances in life than a shop and comparative illiteracy could do; and so I struggled for and got various grants and scholarships that enabled me to study and to take a degree in science and some mediocre honors in the new and now great and growing University of London.

"After I had graduated I taught biology for two or three years and then became a journalist, partly because it is a more remunerative profession in England than teaching, but partly also because I had always taken the keenest interest in writing English. Some little kink in my mind had always made the writing of prose very interesting to me.

"I began first to write literary articles, criticisms and so forth, and presently short imaginative stories in which I made use of the teeming suggestions of modern science. There is a considerable demand for this sort of fiction in Great Britain and America, and my first book, "The Time Machine," published in 1895, attracted considerable attention, and with two of its successors, "The War of the Worlds" and "The Invisible Man," gave me a sufficient popularity to enable me to devote myself exclusively, and with a certain sense of security, to purely literary work.

"Don't you think it is wrong to go fishing on Sunday?" asked the good deacon.

"Sure," replied the unregenerate backslider. "Any fish that is wicked enough to bite on Sunday deserves to get caught!"

Monument to German Airmen.

BERLIN.—An imposing monument in honor of German airmen who fell in the war is to be erected on the summit of the Regenstein, a precipitous sandstone cliff 570 feet high, situated in a romantic spot in the Harz region. Field Marshal von Hindenburg has accepted the honorary chairmanship of the committee. The Regenstein was one of the greatest strongholds of the "robber barons" of the middle ages and figures largely in German history.
