Marston eyed it jealously. "Such a display of money," he criticised. "It's beautiful," Miss Carstairs assured him. "Oh, well, my violets won't have a railroads; and electric line coming, chance now," but it was a question rather than an assertion, and Miss Carstairs said, "How do you know?" And that was encouragement, or would have been from anybody but Miss Car-

Marston looked at her. "I wonder why you say that?" he asked. "What difference does it make"-Helen stared at him. "I thought"- she gasped. "That I wanted to marry you," he finished for her. "But I don't!" and he settied back in his chair and looked out toward the line of the tropical shore, where a few cocoanut paims were silhouetted against a purple sea.

"Oh!' Helen's sense of importance had departed. Suddenly she felt immeasurably insignificant, but this feeling was succeeded by one of intense indignation.

"Of all things!" she ejaculated. "Well, I know it's unusual for a man to withdraw a proposition of that kind in ten minutes, and I know I said some pretty insistent things just before the train left, but I've changed my mind. It's usually a woman's prerogative."

She simply sat there with her cheeks burning and hated him. Curiosity getting the better of her, however, she asked:

"But why?" "That thing," Marston said succinctly and nodded toward the hamper. "To as he finished the catalogue. "No." She turned from him to a contemplation of the scenery, and for a time they rode in silence, passing beyoud the long line of palms to the orange groves-brilliant stretches of yellow and green that filled the ear with the fragrance of wedding bouquets. Marston fixed her with a stern eye. "I tell you right now, Helen," he sald, "that I won't run this race in competition with Deering. I don't trot in the same class. You can give him up or give me up.

Helen reached over and touched the electric bell. "Will you bring me some telegraph blanks?" she said to the porter when he came.

"And now will you lend me a per cil?" she asked Marston as she flutterryl the leaves of the yellow pad. "What are you golde to do?" Marston prestioned as he handed it to her.

The other passengers were growing speculative as to the actions of the handsome young couple. Helen, suddenly conscious of their observation, communited: "Go up there and get me one of my boxes of candy and some fruit. People will think you are proposing to me." "I am. Will you marry me, Helen? "Not natil you get my candy."

He came back, staggering under Deering's hamper, and passed the porer going out, with a telegraph blank n his hand.

Marston dropped the hamper on the cat in front of Miss Carstairs and irried after the porter.

And then Helen waited. A half hour passed-three-quarters. She grew worried. Did he care enough to hurt himself in any way? It wasn't like Richand to kill himself for disappointed

The eyes of the other passengers followed her. She walked with ease and lightness, and from the topmost wave of her brown hair to the tip of her tan soots she was absolutely correct, modsh, beautiful, She found Marston on the observa

The New England ministers of early days were expected to preserve an aspect grave to the verge of solemnity on all occasions, not only on Sundays, sessed a sense of humor it sometimes made itself evident even in the midst of devotional exercises.

One New Hampshire parish was guarded and guided by a quaint speaking elderly man who had a slight lisp. He was fond of outdoor work of almost every sort and was an able farmer as well as preacher, but all domestic matters he relegated to his wife.

One day the old traveling baker, seeing the minister at work in the field, frew rein, and when the jingling of his horse's bells had subsided he called out, "Any crackers wanted today, par-

The minister raised his head and surveyed the baker from under his shaggy eyebrows. No smile of greeting crossed his solemn face.

"Abraham in the field," he responded gravely. "Thurnh (Sarah) in the tent," and without another word be resumed his hoeing and left the baker to digest his Biblical reproof and drive on to the house to find out if "Sarah" would buy THE MARKETS.
