"What's the matter with slipping out now and getting married?" demanded Dudley Winthrop. "You are over le gal age, and the marriage cannot be nullified on the ground that you are a minor, even though that ridiculous will does make you Mrs. Eaton's slave for three years more."

Elizabeth colored. "You see," she said shamefacedly, "auntie is afraid of some such thing and—John watches."

"You don't mean to say that she has had the footman act as a spy upon you?" he gasped.

Elizabeth nodded. "You don't realize how bitter auntie is," she explained.

"Just because my father married an other girl? Surely that does not ex-use her setting the servants to spy upon you. We can slip out of the side door, then."

"Robert is in the side street with the carriage," she said, while the blood dyed her face a deeper red. "I'm afraid that there is no chance, dear."

"But you would if you could?" "You know that, Dudley."

"I'll make the chance," he said. "I never heard of such a thing. I'm going now. I don't want to take a chance of meeting Mrs. Eaton until I've had time to cool down. I'll send you word."

Winthrop passed out with a pleasant adieu to his hostess, and as he descended the steps the sudden alertness of the footman in the Eaton livery told him that Elizabeth's suspicions were correct.

Mrs. Eaton had never forgiven Dudley Winthrop's father for his fancied slight. She had determined to marry him, but while he was attentively courteous he had given no indication of his preference for her. For all of that his marriage to another woman had been a defeat she had never forgiven, and now that she was the legal guardian of her sister's child until Elizabeth should become twenty-one she threw every obstacle in the way of the match between the two young people, even planning to frustrate an elopement through the watchfulness of her carriage servants.

Dudley had an appointment with an out of town acquaintance, and when he came to Forty-second street he turned his steps toward Broadway. The man he sought was in the grill room in the new hotel's basement, they told him, at his desk, and presently Dudley found himself facing the long marble corridor from his seat at one of the tables.

"What's the procession?" he demanded as he pointed to the persons who, after descending the stairs, vanished down a short corridor just beyond.

"Going to take the subway," said the visitor. "I thought you New Yorkers knew everything. Don't you know that the Knickerbocker has two entrances to the subway—one through the cafe and one down that hallway? It's great on a rainy day."

"It's good any old day," smiled Winthrop as a sudden inspiration came to him. "I'm glad I found it out."

After that Winthrop became a regular occupant of the table that gave a view of the corridor, sitting there sometimes for an hour after the black coffee had been served, and at last his patience was rewarded, for Elizabeth came hurrying down the stairway.

"Let's run!" she cried as he hurried forward. "I told auntie I wanted to stop and telephone. She only knows the hotel from the restaurant, and she's having a cup of tea in there this blessed minute, safe in the knowledge that the men are on guard outside."

She was dragging Winthrop down the corridor and across the platform. Through the tunnel came the rumble of an approaching train, and they slipped through the gate just as it came to a stop.

"Which way are we going?" she demanded as she settled into a seat. "Downtown," he explained. "There is a little tunnel that leads over to the uptown platform, but I wanted to get away quickly. We can get off at the next station and cross there. Dr. Bliss lives on Ninety-sixth street."

The plan was simple enough, and, though there was a wait for an uptown express, they were soon on board. There is a curve at Forty-second street where the tracks swing into Broadway, and here the train slowed down, Elizabeth, looking through the window, gave a little scream. Standing in the entrance from the Knickerbocker was her aunt with a most laughable expression of bewilderment upon her face. It was just a fleeting teleru; then the train gathered speed, and Elizabeth sank back in her seat.

"Auntie has just discovered the slight," she announced, with a low ripple of laughter. "Her expression was the funniest thing, Dudley."

"I wish I could hear what she is saying," he chuckled. "I fancy that she will lose her faith in coachmen a-plen now. It's a mighty good lesson for her, Elizabeth."

"To think of your disinterestedness in giving the lesson!" she said demurely. "It does great credit to your generosity."

They both laughed at the suggestion until the train shot into the Ninety-sixth street station and they hurried above ground.

Half an hour and the kindly old rec- tor had escorted them to the door. Elizabeth clutched the certificate of marriage as though she feared to lose it and sighed with relief as she heard Winthrop give his address to the driver.

But she gasped as they drew up in front of the house and saw the Eaton carriage driving slowly up and down, while the footman paced the walk.

"Auntie must be waiting for us," she said. "Do you suppose she is very angry, Dudley?"

"Let's find out," he suggested as he helped her out and ran up the steps. "Are you married?" demanded Mrs. Eaton from the drawing room as they entered the hall.

"Half an hour ago," declared Winthrop. "Then," she said practically, "I shall have to make the best of it, I suppose. But I must say that when I saw that the hotel advertised every modern convenience I did not suppose that that included facilities for underground elopements."

"There's only one old fashioned aspect to the affair," laughed Winthrop. "And that?" asked Mrs. Eaton coldly.

"And so they were married," he quoted, "and lived happy ever after," and he drew Elizabeth into his arms and kissed her.
