Many cattle all over the United States annually are poisoned by the deadly larkspur. A Colorado man recently experimented by feeding the leaves to a calf, without any bad results. Later he gave it the roots of the larkspur, and the animal soon died. This justifies the belief that the poisonous matter is contained in the roots and not the leaves.

The Committee on Ways and Means appointed by the Oregon Good Roads Conference have arranged for a Good Roads Convention at Tillamook September 4th, and another at Roseburg September 22nd. A petition has been filed in the Tillamook county court, asking for the establishment of a new wagon road. The new route would strike the Southern Pacific line at Gaston, and it is figured that by the new road, Tillamook could get a mail to Portland and return in 22 hours. It is also estimated that the government could save $2,000 a year on mail contracts. It would also open up a good country to settlement.
