BORE TEN TONS OF FRUIT.

Enormous Product of the Famous Santa Barbara Grapevine.

The largest grapevine in the world was one growing at Santa Barbara, Cal. There is no record of its age at the time it withered and died a few years ago, but from events connected with the family upon whose ground & grew it was believed to be 75 or 100 years old. The measurement of 113 trunk is given as three feet ten inches In circumference and the arbor was about seventy-five feet square. Its death was believed to be premature, the result of changing the course of a small stream that had flowed near its roots.

But snother vine nearby, a cutting from the original, had attained to nearly this size, so that Santa Barbara could still boast of having "the biggest grapevine in the world. In 1899 this vine succumbed to a disease of the roots, perhaps invited by age, and its body now rests in the Santa Barbara Chamber of Commerce. Its regular trunk attained a girth of four feet four inches at eighteen inches above the ground or five feet seven inches at forty-two inches, and its maximum yield was four tons in a season. It was believed to be seventy-five years old.

In the Carpinteria valley, a few miles further from the city, a third vine has surpassed both of the others in size. It was planted in 1842 by Josquin Lugo De Ayaia and has, therefore, just completed its three-score years. The first election in Santa Barbara county under American rule was held beneath its arate into huge branches, the largest year. Fabulous tales are told of the some hind of wood, grapes this vine produces. That it did son seems to be authentic.

Dudley Foulke, the Civil Service Conmissioner, went with his grandmother to the Senate to hear Senator Tillman's speech. They had fine sents in the front of the member's gallery, and the little chap made a brave show in listened intently, but didn't make out much of it until Senator Tillman referred, with much emphasis, to "anthracite coal." Then he piped up joy: onsly, so he was heard all over the
