MEEK, THE FATHER OF OREGON

Sixty-six years ago, May 2, Washington county played an important part in the history of Oregon—then all the terriitory west of the Rocky Mountains, and north of California. In the holding of this empire to American territory the four votes from the "Tualatin Plains" were indispensable. The man of the hour was Col. Joseph L. Meek, and it was through his efforts that Chas. McKay, Squire Eberts and Caleb Wilkins accompanied him to Champoeg, where the intrepid Meek forced a vote, the Americans winning by a vote of two, only. Meek was a natural leader. He has never been given his rightful place in Oregon history. He was a man of community instinct; he believed in government, and he was the ideal American. Meek was the trapper-cavalier who dominated the assembly at Champoeg just as assuredly as Washington dominated the Continental Congress in Revolutionary times—and the territory Meek saved was greater in extent and riches than that saved by the fathers of 1776. Oregon long since should have given the Virginian a suitable recognition in the way of a monument—a tribute long delayed. However, the social organization too oft forgets the past in the blinding glare of the present.

"O! Seyer of soft Southern phrase,
With heart that knew no fear—
Whose strong arms hewed the pathless wilds
And pierced the great frontier.

From Old Virginia's shore you came—
Close by Atlantic's tide.
And spanned America's expanse
To old Pacific wide.

A cavalier; of stature great;
And eye with prophet's gleam;
You made your fight for Nation's flag,
And now you softly dream—

Your frame of Hercules is low,
And mingles with the earth
In sunny vale, in Oregon,
The land you helped give birth!"
