If a merchant would stand around on the etreet corners and well hihead off about his "politic." or "religion" and rail because those who might agree with him did not give him their entire custom, he would be a candidate for the ali n ists. The same applies in all lines of business.

A close examination will show that Hillsboro merchants are today selling clothing and all lines of merchandise cheaper than Port land, except an occasional leade which is overstocked. There is are less.

Good Luck Rings.

timore American.

A man stood on a lower Broadway corner with a box of good luck rings. They were horseshoe nalls made into rings, bright like silver, glittering in the sun. It was amazing the number of people who went up and bought these rings of the man, fitting them carefully on their fingers, paying for them, walking off with them, turning them this way and that to admire them, though their price was only a nickel.

"Do you make your living selling them?" asked a woman, who bought a very fetching one for her third fin-

Miss Morvimer, an orphan living with an aunt; was rich, beautiful and otherwise attractive. At twenty-five she began to think it time to cease declining all the offers of marriage review the men from whom she knew she might pick, she settled on three-Arthur Emerson, a young clergyman of the Episcopal church, Captain Winfield Dempster of the army and Cameron Wood, a nobody. Mr. Emerson was a rising man among the clergy, fact Captain Dempster had distinguished himself in the Spanish-American war; Mr. Wood was chiefly notable for its dolonce. Nevertheless he was attractive to Miss Mortimer. What it was that attracted her she could not herself tell. He was not handsome, though it must be confessed he was to the manner born. He was not especially intellectual, though she was not sure of this because he was too lazy to think. Miss Mortimer always had friends staying with her at her country place in summer and decided to invite the reason-Hillsboro rentals and taxe three candidates to visit her with a view to subjecting them to a certain test which she designed to apply. This pian was suggested by an old friend of her father.

"It is said," he told her, "that no man is a hero to his own valet. That is not true. Napoleon the Great's valet adored him. But no man is a here to himself. At any rate, if he is, he is de ceived. I will suggest a plan by which you can, discover what each one of your three candidates is in his own estimation. Set up somewhere in your house where your guests must occusionally pass a platonized mirror. It is made by coating a glass with a very thin liquid charged with platinum and raised to a red heat. When it is placed igainst a dark surface it reflects; when light is admitted behind it it is transparent. View your candidates from behind it in the dark."

Miss Mortimer ordered the mirror made and placed in the door of a cloak closet at the entrance to her house. Behind it was a window opening into a court with interior shutters. Before it every one entering the house must pass.

The first candidate to arrive was the dergyman. When he entered Miss Mortimer was looking at him through the mirror, though he could not see He gave a glance at his reflection and passed on with evident self satisfaction. The soldier came next and deliberately paused to curl his mustache. Mr. Wood, seeing himself mirrored, stopped and uttered an unintelligible grunt at his appearance.

There was not much in this, but it was a beginning. The next day the hostess caught the clergyman making gestures before the mirror. Castfur i quick glance about him and being satisfied he was unseen, he dropped on his knees, placing the palms of his hands together, practicing the attitude of prayer. Yet it was evident that the object of his worship was herself. Next came the soldier, who, upon entering, stood before the mirror, per-"See here," exclaimed Mrs. Starvem mitting his features to relax with an Miss Mortimer. It was evident that some unworthy thought was passing through his mind. As to the lounger, she could get no definite information from the mirror except that he did not apparently consider himself a handsome man.

Miss Mortimer dismissed Mr. Emer son as too contemptible for further consideration. One night when Cap tain Dempster was out late she fixed up a dummy burgiar behind the mirror and lit a gas jet in the closet. When the captain came home and saw a man pointing an improvised weapon at him he went out the front door and was later advised that he need not return.

Miss Mortimer was disposed to test Mr. Wood further, but rather from curiosity than as a candidate for her She sent him out one evening and while he was gone dressed herself and put on a mask, representing a shriveled old woman. When the door opened to her guest she was sitting behind the mirror Illuminated and looking straight at him. He stopped short, looking steadily at the grim figure. True to his instincts as a gentleman, his hand went up to als hat, which he had never falled to remove in presence of a woman and which he now mechanically deffed. There was wonder in his eyes at seeing an old woman where he had been used to seeing a mirror, but he did not seem disposed to be shocked. Perhaps he was too lazy. Miss Mortimer sat mute. looking at him through the two holes in her mask. Finally he spoke: "Madam, I wish you a very good evening." His imperturbability was too much for Miss Mortimer. With a laugh she threw off her cloak and her mask and stood before him in her own person. Then, opening the door between them, she stepped forth, gave him her hand and said:

"I devised this mirror, transparent when lighted from behind, to observe you and two other men when you supposed yourselves alone. You of the three have stood whatever of test there is in it. The others may be fine men toward the world. You are not a fine man even to yourself, but you have the instincts of a gentleman, and your equanimity is not easily disturbed. I shall run less risk in marrying you than the others and am ready to do so. Have you made up your mind that you really want me?"

"What's the use," he drawled, "If you've made up yours?" "True. The exertion is unnecessary "

A young man in evening dress under a light overcoat appeared at the opening. Whether through nervusness on Miss Burwell's part of misulculation or what not, the young man received a charge of water on his shirt front.

A moment later there was an inter sting tableau. Miss Burwell stood re garding Mr. Farrell with an expression n her face of (at least apparent) comniscration.
