A Bright Girl

By DORA GOODRICK

Copyright, 1910, by American Press Association.

Abercrombie, who was a bachelor, did not spend his time dawdling around clubs and drawing rooms. He owned splendid yacht, the Theta, big enough to sall anywhere in any waters, and in this yacht he made his home. He contributed quite a number of inventions to assist scientists in making deep sea soundings and investigating ocean currents and at the time referred to in this story was endeavoring to simplify sea signals.

Abererombie safled to the Philippines among other places, where be was welcomed by the United States officials, especially the officers of the army. Among the families of the offcers he met Miss Lella Turnlee, the daughter of Colonel Turnlee, commander of the -th infantry. Miss Turnies understood his device readily. Now, the way Abercrombie knew that Miss Turnice understood his contrivances was because she always said Yes" and "Indeed" and "How clever" exactly at the right time, and when he asked, "Do you follow me?" she always replied, "Perfectly."

Mrs. Turniee was much pleased th her daughter had a mind capable of receiving the explanations of Abercromble's inventions by Abercromble himself, not that she cared anything for the inventions, but she hoped her daughter's vigor of intellect would lend Abercrombie to become interested and possibly that a fine catch would fall to the family. The good lady had dragged half a dozen children over many territories in the western portion of America during her younger days and had known what it was to get settled in quarters to be immediately ordered to some other station or turned out by a ranking officer. Abercrombie's yacht was preferable to an adobe but or log apartment even when fixed. In other words, Mrs. Turnlee desired that her daughter should marry elsewhere than in the

At dinner one evening at Colonel Turnlee's quarters Abercromble was explaining to the family his new system of sea signals. Colonel Turnlee who was a West Pointer and should have understood anything in the signal line, knew but little of what his guest said. Mrs. Turnies understood never a word. Miss Lella did not need to ask a single question. It all seemed to go straight to her brain and find a lodgment there.

"Upon my word!" exclaimed Abercromble. "How did you good people come to have a daughter so much brighter than yourselves?"

"Lella has always attended the best schools," said the fond mother point-"Besides, she has scientific tastes."

"I have never met," Abercrombie declared enthusiastically, "one who has taken in everything I have said so readily." "She inherited it from her grandfather, Admiral Turnice," the mother pursued. "He wrote a book on soral reefs and another on volcanie formations. Children always take from their grandparents rather than their own fathers."

Colonel Turnlee, who was cracking nuts, did not notice his wife's asper sions on his own generation. "Do you think, Miss Turnlee," said Abercromble, "that if I were to send you a message by my code from my yacht out in the bay you would under "I think I would," replied the girl demurely-"that is, if it were not too long." "Very well. Look out for one tonorrow afternoon."

"How shall I reply? I have ne signals." "You can write or, better, tele graph." Miss Lella made no reply to this. Possibly she was timid at being put to the test, fearing that she might fall. don't know how she felt about it. I only throw this out as a suggestion. Her mother had confidence that she would understand the signal perfectly and furnish Abercromble with fresh evidence of the brilliancy of her intellect. The solonel went on cracking and munching nuts, but said nothing. When the dinner broke up he had to go over to see the commanding general, and Mrs. Turnlee received a visit from the major's wife. This left Abercromble and Miss Lella alone together

The next day at 3 there were evidences on the Theta of a desire to communicate with some one. Abercromble himself was bolding up little flags and running them down again. His message was, "You are a very bright girl." When the signaling was over Abererombie waited for her telegram. It did not come, but later Colo nel Turnice's orderly brought a note.
