 GEORGE W. HANCOCK, Sheriff and Tax Collector of Washington County, Or.
 Dated this 11th day of Aug., 1911.

A. O. Johnson, of South Tuatatin, was in the city Monday.
 Henry Toelle, of beyond Glencoe, was in the city the last of the week.
 John Hinck, of Buxton, was a county seat visitor the first of the week.
 Miss Anna Boge, of Farmington, was the guest of Mrs. Dolan, Monday.
 Chaney L. Benefiel, of Crawford, was down to the city Monday afternoon.
 Wanted—Plymouth Rock hens and Pekin White ducks.—Address Perry Ellis, Dilley, Ore.
 Mrs. S. C. Killin and daughter, Miss Helen, returned Monday evening from an outing at Newport.
 County Treasurer Jackson and wife departed Tuesday, for a two weeks stay at Stevenson, Skamania County, Washington.
 Mr. and Mrs. R. L. Bodey, of Portland, visited friends in town Saturday. Mrs. Bodey was formerly Miss Olive Landis, of this city.
 Montgomery Turner, of Banks, was down Monday, taking out a hunting license for a trip into the big Nehalem woods, after a bear.
 Rev. Guy Stover, formerly of Hillsboro, and now pastor of the Evangelical Church at St. Johns, was out to the city Monday, on business.
 C. E. Kindt and wife, of Kinton, returned Monday from an extended outing at Newport, where they visited the Waggener and Wilcox families.
 Mr. and Mrs. H. T. Blair and little daughter, of Portland, Mrs. Ida Rollo, a sister of Mrs. Blair, and Miss Marguerite Meyer, of Salem, were out Sunday and Monday, guests at the home of Mrs. Ruth A. Blair.
 P. H. Vandehy and N. P. Jansen, of Beaverton, were up to the county seat, Tuesday. The boys allege that the Beaverton Reporter man thought a catch of 60 dozen grasshoppers—and they're sure he must have come from Kansas.
 Leo Schwander, of above Mountindale, and who is having venison on his bill of fare, these days, was in the city Tuesday. The Argus reporter will not soon forget the fine venison steak Leo sent him when he was running the big Bagley hopyards, a few years ago.
 J. C. Kuratli returned from Newport, Monday evening, his family remaining at the beach. J. C. says that almost every other person you meet down there is from Hillsboro. This bodes well for the Tillamook beaches next season, when the P. R. & N. gets its trains running.
 C. B. Davis, wife, and family, were down last week from the Bishop Bros.' mill, making the trip for optical treatment for Mrs. Davis, who is in danger of losing the sight of one of her eyes. The attending physician states she must keep the ailing member in darkness and absolute quiet for several weeks.
 A. P. Luther, wife and son, Earl, and Clarence Barber and wife and son, went to Houlton, Sunday, after catfish, and report a good catch. The morning they arrived they found a German bewailing the loss of a burned barn, containing hay and personal property. Evidently some one had attempted to harness the German's team and steal it, for he found the chain harness in the front part of one of the stalls. The animals had broken loose and got out into the open before the fire caught them. It is supposed that the parties trying to steal the team had some trouble getting the harness untangled, and had struck a match, with the result that the barn went up in smoke.

A Modern King-Beggar Maid Story

By ARTHUR W. BREWSTER
 Copyright by American Press Association, 1911.

We are careful that our children shall read books in which noble deeds are rewarded and selfishness is abominated. Then when they reach an age to understand something about the world they are about to enter we tell them that these stories are mere romance, with nothing practical in them.
 Such was the way I was brought up. When I was eighteen the transition came. My mother a few years before had taken for a maid of all work—that is, small odds and ends such as a child could perform—a girl of fourteen. I understood that Ethel had been taken partly for charity and partly because my mother found such a helper convenient. My mother gave us all to understand that her principal reason was charity, though she really needed a young girl for certain duties. But I had not then reached an age where I was to be instructed that self sacrifice was simply romance.
 I did not treat Ethel as a servant, and I was not required to so treat her. But my parents did consider that there was danger for my worldly interest in this demure little girl. It was not till I went to college that I realized that this danger existed. The morning I started I went to find Ethel to say goodby to her. I found her dusting the parlor.
 "Ethel," I said gaily, "I have come to say goodby."
 She went on dusting without paying any attention to me, keeping her back toward me. Taking her by the arm, I turned her and discovered the cause of her keeping her face from me. There were tears in her eyes. Whether it was due to my education or to a natural instinct I don't know—I may have been largely influenced by the romances of kings and princes marrying beggar maidens—but certain it is I begged the tears away. Then, the carriage being ready for my departure, I left the little girl with a sweet taste on my lips and a tender emotion about the heart.
 Whether my mother suspected that Ethel missed me or that she considered me quite old enough to understand that love affairs between kings and beggar maids was pure romance I don't know; but, though I often spoke of Ethel among others in my letters, mother never referred to the little girl in one of hers. Instead she wrote me that now I was entering upon that stage of life where a young man's fancy turns to love I should be careful in my attentions to young women, not becoming involved with any that it would not be advantageous for me to marry. She had often when I was a child read me those king and beggar maid stories with evident delight to herself, and I was not yet old enough to understand the chance. But I was old enough to begin to think for myself, and I resolved that I would not honorably toward any young woman with whom I might become involved.
 But what a difference between the age of experience and the age of romance! And how singular that after experience comes romance remains! True, when older we simply daily with it, sip it like delicious wine, but do not get intoxicated with it sufficiently to injure ourselves.
 When I went home for my first vacation Ethel was not there. I asked my mother about her, and she said that the girl had concluded to learn some method of making her living more to her taste than being a servant, and upon the winding up of her father's estate, having received some means, she had entered a business college. I knew that my mother had taken the girl from a family that had been well to do, and at a time when her father had just died insolvent.
 I made no inquiries at home as to what college Ethel was attending, but learned it elsewhere. Then I went to see her. She had grown and filled out and improved in every way. She received me without any reference to the tender scene that had occurred at the time of my departure for college. It was evident from her manner that her servant days were over and that she stood on the American basis that a woman in the new fields open to her is on a social par with the generality of men and women. Not that she obtruded this change upon me; I simply was aware that it existed. I left her after a friendly meeting, having borne myself toward her as I would any other acquaintance with whom I had lived under the same roof, but I concealed my feelings.
 I saw Ethel whenever I came from college for vacation, but said nothing at home about my calls. When I returned after being graduated I found staying in the house a young woman whom my mother had persuaded to visit her, doubtless hoping to make a match between her and me. At any rate, the girl was worth $300,000 in her own right.
 What a change from the king and beggar maid stories mother had read me!
 Poor mother! She was doomed to disappointment. I did not want a fortune ready made for me at the beginning of my life and in the keeping of another. What I did want was my servant maid. Mother was terribly shocked when I informed her that I was to marry Ethel, but she accepted the situation.
 "It's all your fault, mother," I said. "You should not have read to me those king-beggar maid stories."
