LONG & McKINNEY

As a matter of fact, Hillsboro does not care, and it is not a case of "sour grapes." But Hillsboro does believe in the law of averages. A few years ago Hillsboro's business men spent several thousand dollars buying right of way to start the Tillamook line; it canvassed Portland for aid—and it received several hundred dollars, the bulk of which came from the breweries which sold beer to Hillsboro consumers. "Big Business" shied like a skittish horse—but Hillsboro persevered, and after one combination went broke, spent time and substance in interesting E. E. and C. E. Lytle in the railway project. The Lytles took hold—the road was built. Hillsboro was benefitted to some extent, because it built up tributary country. Hillsboro was instrumental in giving Tillamook a railway line. When all was over Portland "Big Business" received a neat little invitation to visit Tillamook, while Hillsboro, like the traditional "boob" was not even given a look-in. Hillsboro would start another line into Tillamook if it thought it would mean more development—but it would not blush if our coast friends would appreciate the humble efforts of a small sister city.

BRANDAW—SIGLER

Sigler, Third Street, Hillsboro, Wednesday evening, June 5, 1912, at 8 o'clock, Rev. Samuel Upton officiating. The house was prettily decorated with evergreen and roses. The bride was gowned in a beautiful creation of white crepe du chine trimmed in messaline and silk fringe, and carried bride's roses. Miss Gussie Sigler, bridesmaid, wore pink silk and carried a bouquet of pink roses. Louis Brandaw, a brother of the groom, was best man.

Following the ceremony, refreshments were enjoyed by the large wedding assembly, and meanwhile Mr. and Mrs. Brandaw made their escape in an auto, so that out of a party of twenty who were present to shower rice on the newly wedded pair, but one succeeded. They departed for a short stay at the home of the groom's parents, south of Cornelius, and will be at home to their friends, in their own home, Tenth and Fir, after June 15.

The present were many and beautiful. Those present at the wedding:
