The court house contractor, Mr. Foster is about ready to close up construction, but is being delayed with his hardware and some of the mahogany for interior work. He states that he could get through in a few days if his material would only arrive. The interior of the building is going to have a splendid appearance, and the officials are eager to get into their new quarters.

Well, well, the election is over—and it has been a very quiet, orderly campaign. There has been very little of mud-slinging in Washington County, Multnomah having the monopoly in that line. If you had read the daily papers the past month you would have thought that the future of the city depended on certain candidates being elected. Here in Washington County the Bull Mooser, the democrat and Taft man all dwelt in harmony, and there was no hair pulling to mention. Really, it was the best natured campaign in the history of the county, and the three-cornered campaign has done a world of good in that respect, anyway, if nothing else.

Jno. M. Brown and wife moved to their farm near Buxton, last Friday, and J. M. will try the simple life for a while, after spending all his life in Hillsboro. For many years was deputy in the postoffice, and when Lee Williams passed away he took charge of the Wells-Fargo business, which he held until last week, when he was relieved by E. E. Ling, of Salem. John had put in his call for relief several months ago, but the company had held him as long as they could. During all these years Mr. Brown has given eminent satisfaction, and he has always been courteous and trustworthy. The Argus wishes him all kinds of good luck raising cattle, chickens, and everything that goes with successful ranching. Mr. Ling comes well recommended, and is proving an efficient agent.
