Twenty Years After By REGINALD D. HAVEN

One day I went up into the garret to and something I needed. While rummaging over old trunks and old boxes I found a trunk that was marked "Family Documents." Curious to learn if I had stumbled on anything valuable,

While overhauling a lot of old papers came across two batches of letters came across two batches of letters been drunk, and that the drunks To Portland-and together with a ribbon that had but sparingly. The letters had evidently passed between a couple many years before, for the paper was tinged with yellow, and the ink in some instances had faded. Wondering which of my progenitors had written them, I examined the signature of one of the superfine package and saw that it was signed "Your loving Ethel."

My wife's name being Ethel, I lookand noticed for the sicst time that it was quite like Ethel's-indeed, it was Ethel's bandwriting with twenty years' change attached. I dropped it, took up one of the other lot and discovered that it was my own penmanship at ninete

When I had somewhat recovered from my surprise and abasement the idea occurred to me to inflict one of those old love letters of mine upon my wife. I wished to see how she would take me on paper as I was two decades agone. Our oldest son was now about the age I was when I wrote the letters, and incidentally I thought he might be doing the same thing. Also quite likely our oldest daughter was or soon would be encumbering the mails with what she in time would be quite ashamed of.

I selected one of the most lovesick of my letters and one of a near subse quent date of Ethel's. These I put in my pocket to be kept till she should go into the country with the children. When that time came, instead of saying, "Now write tonight, dear," she said, "Don't let it be a week before you tell us how you're getting on." I asked her how she would like to have me write ber a real nice long letter, and she said she thought it would be

"Brain trouble? No. What makes you think I have?"

"Read that," she said, producing the letter I had sent her. "Well, what's the matter with it?" I

"The matter with it? Do you mean to my that you were in your right mind when you wrote it?"

"I do-as much as you were in your right mind when you wrote the reply." "What reply ?"

I drew out the letter I had in my pocket for her. She took it and began to read, but had not turned a page before she stopped and exclaimed. "What rubbish is this?"
