

HOME INDUSTRY

The firm of H. R. EMMOTT has something new to offer their patrons and future patrons.

From now on each customer who purchases goods at the store to the amount of 10 cents or more, will be given a cash value stamp for each 10 cents worth purchased. Each customer will be furnished with a book and thirty stamps free, to start with, and when the book is full it will represent $100.00 cash purchases. You can take this book full of stamps to any of the following stores in Hillsboro and select your premium to the amount of $3.00 from their well filled stocks.

And it is well to remember that this plan is strictly local, and Hillsboro Merchants benefit thereby. You will get cash value for your Cash Value tickets, and you will not have to pay 50 or 100 per cent more for your premiums, as you do with eastern stamp companies.

With all the petty criticism anent the administration's Mexican policy, Wilson keeps hammering away along his original lines. No lost lives yet, except a few mangy Mexicans, and no one has lost any money except the oil magnates who are financing disturbance down there. Let us all hope that the wise policy inaugurated shall prevail. If the worst comes we can soon clean up the district, but human lives—American lives in this instance—are too valuable to snuff out just to please a few property and bond holding barons.

Nearly a score of citizens were made by Judge Campbell, Tuesday, the greater portion of whom were thrifty Swiss and Germans. As a rule all were conversant with the American form of government, and all will make the best of citizens. These people have been a big factor in the development of Washington County, and they are a people of whom the county can well be proud.

THE MAN WITH THE SUIT CASE

A Story For Thanking

By MARTHA V. MONROE

"Jim, I heard you are going to be married."

"Where did you hear that?"

"Oh, I heard it a month ago! I think it was on Thanksgiving day. I dined with the Atwaters. They said Clara Webster was just the girl for you, you being impulsive, she steady and cautious."

"Did they say that?"

"Yes."

"Listen, I have a little story to tell you. On the very day, Thanksgiving, that those persons were attributing those traits to us a little drama was being enacted."

"My friend Billy Smithson invited Clara and me to spend the Thanksgiving week end at his house in the country, which he opened for the occasion. The affair was got up to celebrate our engagement. For Billy is an old chum of mine, and his wife is an intimate friend of Clara's."

"Clara and I were to go up on the train together, but just as I was about to leave the office to call for her a job came into the office which nobody but I could do, and I was obliged to remain over till the next day. I telephoned her to go on and I would arrive the next day. I reached the house the next afternoon to find the guests gone out on an automobile ride. Billy had got up for them. There were three carloads, and they were not to return till 7 o'clock. About 6 I dressed for dinner and was going downstairs when I met a man coming up with a suit case in his hand. Presuming he was one of the guests who had just arrived, I went on down into the library, thinking no more about him and amusing myself till the auto party returned."

"This was the evening before Thanksgiving. The next day we were getting ready for the feast when Clara looked me into a quiet corner and said to me—

"Will, I have a very unpleasant communication to make. On returning from the auto ride yesterday several of the girl guests missed articles of jewelry. Several boxes in which the jewels were kept were found in the closet in your room."

"Naturally I was a bit upset by this information, but the principal cause was that Clara didn't say this with my hand in hers or her arms around me, but sitting apart, and instead of adding that she felt just absolutely confident that I was not a thief she looked very gloomy and waited for me to say something."

"Clara," I said astounded, "do you mean to say that you have the slightest suspicion that I stole these jewels?"

"It is the bounden duty of every one," she replied, "to consider an accused person innocent until proved guilty. And as your fiancée I feel obliged to do what I can to influence the others to give you every opportunity to clear yourself."

"It was not so much the position in which I was placed that troubled me as the mapping of the cord that bound me to Clara. In a twinkling my feelings toward her were changed from attraction to repulsion. And yet what could I do with her? What right had I to expect her to believe me innocent in face of such proof against me and before I had brought forward any proof in my favor? She was simply sitting on that trail her character for which those persons now being mentioned on that very day were giving her credit.

"The change in my feelings toward her for awhile overtook every other. Then the gravity of my position rushed upon me with full force. But what could I do? I hesitated as I was of how the jewelry boxes got into my room. I didn't see that I could do anything but leave the boxes.

"I went to Billy, who begged me to stay, saying that there was some mystery about the matter which he hoped would be cleared up, but I judged that to do that would make me the matter, and at last he came with me that I might see the boxes, and, passing out, Sue Westworth, who since her father's failure has been making her own living by teaching school, came out of the drawing room into the hall and said—

"Mr. Thornton, this object of your having stolen jewelry is absurd. There are a hundred suggestions that can be made each more likely than what appears on the surface. Some one stole the jewelry, took them into your room temporarily and threw the boxes back there. That's one."

"There was something in her hypothesis that brought back the man I had seen going upstairs with the suit case, and it solved the problem for me, for it occurred to me that I had not seen this man. But this was nothing to me compared with the comfort I derived from Miss Westworth's faith in me. I just got my news about her and hugged her."

"She looked by my statement as to the man with the suit case, changed everything. All came to me and begged me to remain. I did so and was treated cordially by every one. Since then some of the jewels have been recovered in possession of a thief, who confessed my theory of their loss."

"And how about your engagement?"

"Oh, I'm engaged, but not to Clara. She has much reason for it. I don't think I need it, notwithstanding the opinion of your friends."

"To whom are you engaged?"

"To Sue Westworth."
