SHE SAVED HIM

By MAY C. ETHERIDGE

You're a good fellow, and I have no family. I have some stock in the Hope Mining company that is valuable and other securities. They're all in this tin box. There is also a will in the box leaving all I possess to you."

"Why, Mr. Hathorn," said John Murray, surprised, "what in the world put that into your head? I've been workand asked you for a position in your strong man, liable to live thirty or forty years longer."

"I'll tell you, John. You've told me about that wife of yours in the east and that little kid you set so much store by. Something tells me that I've not long to live. If I were to die tomorrow there wouldn't be a person in the world to claim what I left. If I

He took John to his bedroom over the store, pulled up a plank in the floor, put in the box and relaid the plank. Then the two went downstairs and resumed their work. That the east and told her of the bequest that might some day come to them.

It was about three months after this that John, who took care of the books and the cash, made up a deposit of the cash that had come in during the week some ten miles distant. While riding through a narrow defile a man sprang upon him and before he could draw Then, appropriating the money he carried, he left John beside the road and made off in the direction of the store. John remained as he was severa hours before any one came along to release bim; then be returned to report the robbery. Entering the store, he found it deserted. Looking about the place, he found Hathorn's dead body in the barn, with a little bay thrown over it. Here were two troubles John he to report to his neighbors, though the Srst was nothing in comparison with the second. His story booked very un likely. It seemed more probable that be had made up the story about having been robbed, had appropriated the

One day a woman entered a jewelry store at the county seat, where John was awaiting execution, and offered to sell a watch. The jeweler noticed on ix dec'd. the case the initials E. L. H. He ask ed the woman if these were her intials, and she admitted that they were not and looked frightened. This excited the suspicion of the jeweler, and be kept the woman parieying till he could learn more of her. Then it occurred to him that the initials were those of Mr. Hathorn, whose murder had excited so great a commotion in the community. He sent for an officer, and the woman was arrested Having been put through a severe examination, she broke down and confessed that she had murdered Hathern and carried off the watch with her. But she claimed that plunder had not been her object, averring that Hathorn had married and deserted her

There were two opinions as to this confession, the one being that it was untrue, the other that it was genuine. Those who maintained the latter view were supported by the fact that Murray's lawyer had brought evidence to show that Hathorn had feared some secret enemy. This turned the scale Notice is nereny given that scaled hids he was he went to the jail where she was confined to have a look at her. He was astonished to see his own wife. Fortunately the official that was with bim was behind Murray and the wife had time to give her husband a warning look not to recognize her before the man came up. During the interview By Order of the County Judge.

By Order of the County Commissioners' Fortunately the official that was with she also succeeded in whispering to him: "Fty for your life. I will be all right." John saw in this a scheme to save bim and as soon as he left the fail disappeared. A day or two later Mrs. Murray recalled her confession, felling the following story:
