THAT REX-TIGARD ROAD BEFORE US ONCE MORE

The Oregonian, However, Sees the Light and Does us Justice

FOR ONCE WE ARE IN PROPER LIGHT

Great Daily Tells Truth About Highway And we Should Worry

That famous stretch of bad road between Rex and Tigard, over which Brother Waggoner, of Portland, and many others, have abused Washington County so shamelessly for years, is again the subject of attention. The County officials have spent more on the road that they should, and yet they have had nothing but scathing criticism for their acts. This is the piece of road that autoists coming from the South, and going from Portland, on the route to Southern Oregon one way, and to Portland, the other way, want made into macadam, for convenience. It cuts off a small portion of the county, and when other main roads need work so badly, the court for several years has fought shy of expenditure.

Now, it is different. The Oregonian this morning says:

"The importance of the Rex-Tigard link in the Oregon road chain is that it is a part of the Pacific Highway. It is the main connecting west-side road between Portland and a large part of the Willamette Valley. Its weakness lies chiefly in the fact that it cuts across a corner of Washington County and is not an integral part of that county's road scheme. The Washington County commissioners are willing to do all they may reasonably be asked to do for Rex-Tigardville, but others must help."

He was a veteran of the Civil War, and was enlisted with Co. A, First Heavy Artillery, Ind.

He leaves to mourn his loss his widow and the following children: Mrs. Frank Weisenbeck, Oregon City; Mrs. L. S. Leach, Caldwell, Idaho; R. W. Simpson and Mrs. M. S. Williams, of Portland.

Mr. Simpson had always been rugged until a few months ago, when he became afflicted with the malady which caused his demise. He was of a genial nature, and had many friends.
