The first thing Von Bishoff knew about the stranger's coming was information from his daughter that she had given her troth to the fugitive army. Von Bishoff, realizing by this time that his daughter would have her own way in the choice of a husband, gave a forced consent. The couple were married, and a few days later the groom sailed for Holland, from which country he expected to cross the ne into Germany.

Six months after his departure his wife received word from him that he had succeeded in what he had undertaken and was again in the ranks fighting for the fatherland. Then came a letter stating that he was at home adly wounded.

J. M. Vanderzanden, of near Hilds, now Frau Flegler, determined she was resolved on doing so, determined to go with her. They went by way of Copenhagen and in due time arrived at the village from which Herman Bishoff had departed thirty years before for America. The schloss, a dilapidated residence that had once seen a noble pile. was still in posses sion of the family, and there they went. It was occupied by a sister of Von Bishoff, whom he had not taken account of since his departure for America, for he especially valued only the male members of the family. The father and daughter were to put up here until they could learn of the whereabouts of her husband.
