A Sin That Brought A Blessing

By OSCAR COX

As a youth I was diffident, over-sensitive, imaginative, romantic. My mother was very much troubled for fear I would marry some girl with nothing to recommend her but a pretty face. I used to think that she wished me to marry Margaret Deane, who knew how to sew and cook and do a lot of practical things in which I took no interest. I rather admired Gwendolin Germain. Gwendolin was a tender flower, just such a girl as a man likes to take under his protection. Her cheek was not round and rosy, but there was a little pale red in its center like a rosebud painted on a china cup, with lips of the same hue.

The time came when I made up my mind that unless I could win Gwendolin my life would be a failure. I was but twenty, and that's very young for a man to feel that his happiness is bound up for life in one person. However, I proved my constancy by years of devotion to the image I had set up in my heart. Fearing that I could not express myself with sufficient delicacy to impress one so young, so modest, so tender, I wrote my proposal in a letter. I was several days composing it, and when finished I left it for another day on my desk in order to read it once more before posting it.

I was suddenly called away, and when I returned the letter was gone. I asked my mother what had become of it, and she said that it had been posted with a batch of letters that had been sent to the mail while I was away from home. With this I was content and confident that Gwendolin had received it and waited anxiously for a reply.

When I met my love again I was much embarrassed. My imagination made her seem to me cold, even offended, and as she made no reference to my letter, it occurred to me that for some reason—I imagined a dozen—she was displeased with my proposal.

I did not call again, and within a year her family left the place where I lived, and she went with them. My heart went with her. I lived on a bachelor. My mother frequently visited Margaret Deane to our house, and I could see that she was intentionally placing her in my way. Margaret accepted whatever attention I gave her, which was not much, but when I was unkind to her she did not seem to notice it. As the year passed I made a friend of her, but it did not occur to me to make love to her.

When I was thirty my mother died. Before her death she made me a confession.

"My dearest boy," she said, "before I die I wish your forgiveness. Ten years ago I saw that you were about to choose a companion for life who would not make you happy. I kept the letter you wrote to Gwendolin Germain, hoping to gain time to direct your attention to Margaret Deane. Ten years have passed, and every year I have intended to send your letter to Gwendolin. I have never done so till today. By tomorrow morning she will know for the first time of your proposal, but by that time I shall have left you free to choose for yourself."

And so my mother, to whom I was so devoted, had caused me ten years of misery. I forgave her and did not utter a word of complaint. Indeed, the pain I suffered at her loss neutralized any feeling of regret for my long suffering.

The day after I laid her in the grave I took up a number of letters that had accumulated—mostly of condolence—and among them was one from Gwendolin. It brought the first of different sensations from what I had experienced since the beginning of my mother's illness. But with it came the remembrance of what my mother must have endured from her distaste for my choice. Margaret had been with her constantly in her last days and had comforted her as if she had been her own daughter.

I felt an inclination to complete the sacrifice my mother had brought about by acceding to her wishes and giving Margaret the option of being my wife. But I was bound in honor to Gwendolin as well as by love. In her letter she asked me to come and see her if I felt so inclined.

A few days later I went to see her. She still lived with her family, who were wealthy—more so than when I had parted from her—in a stately mansion. It was evening when I called, and I was ushered into a private parlor. In a few minutes a bony, sallow, scrawny woman came into the room, dressed in the height of fashion, bedecked with jewels, her hands covered with rings. I barely recognized Gwendolin and would not have done so had she not preserved the rosebud in her cheek by a touch of paint.

"So your poor mother has gone," she said. "What a silly thing to keep your letter from me! Just as if I were counting on you. You were lovely as a boy, I admit; but, you know, papa has always brought me up to understand that I must marry money, and of course that would not include you. But we can be friends, you know. Just now I'm without a cavalier—that is, one that I fancy—and you must come often, and you shall be my attendant. People will talk, you know; but you mustn't mind that."

There was a good deal more that I did not hear. In due time I escaped, and had no sooner got home than I set myself to work to win the heart of Margaret Deane. I found that it had been mine for years.

God bless my mother and her sin.

THE GOOD JUDGE JOINS THE ARMY.

WHEN men are drawn together in the army, you find out a lot about their likes and dislikes. It's always been a great place for the spread of W-B CUT popularity. They show each other why you shouldn't take more than a little chew of W-B CUT. Every shred is chock full of sap; a big chew is too rich. They take to W-B CUT, strong; nothing is too good for our soldiers.
