The county commissioners have filed an order with the Co. Treasurer and with the Secretary of State eschewing the right to have the county treasurer pay the warrants of school districts. The new law, passed last winter, allows counties to elect whether or not school claims will be paid in the old way, where districts are given their money, or allow the districts merely to pass on claims and have them paid by the treasurer. The new way would have no money in the hands of the district whatever, and the county court considered that as long as school clerks were bandied they could handle their own funds.
