Historical Places of India Described In Zenas Olson Letter to Home Folks

BALDWIN BOYS' HIGH SCHOOL
Bangalore, India
2nd July, 1925

Dear Home Folks:

It is my pleasant duty to tell you about our trip last week-end. We had long wanted to visit some of the historic points about here, with such of the boys as could go, but had not made the break before during this year. One year we visited Mysore at Desara time and saw the wonderful sights; another year we went to the Kolar Gold Fields and saw the underground works, riding down to the 5100 foot level—almost a mile below ground. But this trip was the scene of real history.

Sometime about 1780 a Mohammedan ruler conquered this part of the country and built up a big empire in Mysore. His son, who followed him, was called Tippu Sultan. He fortified Bangalore, but paid most attention to building up his capital, Seringapatam, which is built on an island in the Cauvery river, about 80 miles south of Bangalore. It is a large island, and on one end he built a big fort surrounded by two walls and a moat. Besides this he could depend upon the river which is full of water for part of the year. When he had things ready he got in a quarrel with the British in 1792. A strong force came against him and took his fort. He had to give up much of his territory and a great deal of money, but he kept on fortifying his island. Finally in 1799 trouble again arose and another British army came to Seringapatam, took the fort. Tippu himself was killed. Then Mysore became British and was handed over to Hindu rulers afterwards.

We started on Thursday evening—12 boys, Miss Hoffman, Miss Gardner, the two of us, and Benjamin the cook. The train was crowded and we got stretched out as best we might and so spent the night. We arrived about 5 a. m. in the darkness, but made our way to the Travellers' Bungalow—a house set aside for visitors. After cleaning up and having chota hari we set out to see the sights. Its a long walk to Tippu's Tomb, but the sight is worth the trip. Its a white domed mausoleum and inside are the graves of Tippu, his father and his mother. We had to take off our shoes to enter here. The grounds are well laid out and the walks beautiful. Along the way we saw some great banyan trees which sent roots down from the branches. On one the boys had great fun swinging on the long roots, which are strong enough to support them. In the afternoon we went to see the Scott's bungalow, the house of a military officer who had charge after Tippu's death. It is said he came home and found his wife and children dead with cholera on day, so resigned his post and went to England. The house has since been unused. When we came back to the walls we followed the moat for a long ways, and came in through the gates. Then we climbed up to the raised mound where the flagstaff stands and from here we could see all the insides of the fort. (Note—The term fort does not mean a building but an enclosed tract with walls around). Just below is a little village where the few people of the place live. Further on is the Grand Mosque which Tippu had built, with two tall white minarets. Some of the party climbed this but I did not. To one side are two large temples, one called Sri Runga, which gives its name to the place. We went over the fort on Saturday morning and saw these things more closely, as well as De Haviland's Arch, which is an arch with a span of 155 feet. We climbed up and had our pictures taken sitting at the top, and afterwards the boys rocked it. It swings up and down nicely. One other place was the Daria Doulat Bagh, "Garden of the Wealth of the Sea"—the summer palace. It is in the midst of a beautiful garden, and is a very pretty building richly ornamented. On the walls outside are pictures of Tippu's victories and scenes from Mysore history. At 2:45 p. m. we got on the train and came home. Some of the more intimate stories will be sent as fodder for later digestion. We got some good pictures. All enjoyed the picnic and the scenes—but all were tired enough to rest when we got home. More later.

Lovingly,
Zenas.

Time For Third Spray

First Moth of Second Generation Appeared July 25

Growers in the Willamette Valley should apply the third codling moth spray not later than August 8th. The first moth of the second generation appeared in the rearing cage July 25. It is estimated that the maximum number of moths will appear during the first week in August. The egg hatching period will begin about August 3, and the peak of the egg hatching period will probably be about the middle of August. The poison cover spray should be on the foliage, pears and apples before the worm hatches.

Increasing the dosage to 5 lbs. of powdered arsenate of lead to 200 gallons of water in this spray is a frequent practice.

Mr. and Mrs. L. E. Blatchley are at Mt. Ranier for the week.
