SUCCESS WITH ALFALFA

The lesson that everything depends on the early treatment of alfalfa, recently emphasized in the Washington county demonstrations, had long ago been learned by the farmers of Europe, who valued the crop before we did but were prevented by an old world conservatism from enjoying its benefits as those in America have done. The ideal stand of this important legume is produced by painstaking cultivation persisted in until the crop is thoroughly established. And as a matter of fact, through the labor cost of perfect treatment seems nearly prohibitive under new world conditions, there is reason for supposing that it pays in the end. Alfalfa possesses the quality of permanency to a greater extent than other forage plants, and its planting partakes of the nature of an investment, as with other fixtures on the farm.

Seed inoculation is important, as was shown not only by County Agent McWhorter but by others who have contributed to the success of the experiment, and, together with common prudence in selecting varieties and suitable soil and location, should guarantee the wide extension of this most useful of crops. But inoculation, once a mystery to all but the elect, has fortunately been made easy and the necessary bacteria are accessible to all, so that the grower who fails must look to his methods and not to the merits of alfalfa to find the cause.

The slogan of the agricultural committee of the Portland chamber of commerce, "Alfalfa on every farm," is based on authentic experience, not on a theory. Alfalfa has a high place in balanced farming because it facilitates the keeping of livestock, which in turn is necessary to the maintenance of soil fertility, because it is in itself a soil tonic, and because it has proved merit as a stock food. It has suffered in some quarters from mistreatment. It deserves to be understood and reintroduced.—Oregonian.
