Government Moves on Four Fronts to Make Americans "Home-Minded"

James A. Moffett (sketch at right), Federal Housing Administrator, gazes at one of the new low-cost PWA houses, situated in Euclid, O.

BUILD or buy a home? If you have one, repair that roof, install that shower—get busy on those hundred and one little home improvements that you postponed during depression years!

Three agencies benefiting home owners are already well established. HOLC—Home Owners Loan Corporation—has been refinancing mortgages for owners threatened by foreclosure.

With government money, the third agency—Subsistence Homesteads Division of the Interior Department—buys land, builds homes, and provides stock and machinery for farming small plots of soil.

AND new the fourth—and greatest—unit of the federal housing scheme, swings into action. Under the new National Housing Act, no direct loans for home building or repair will be made. Instead of public funds, hoards of private money will be enlisted to make Americans home-conscious.

Normally, America spends $11,000,000,000 a year in construction. Now we're spending only $3,000,000,000, and we're five years behind in normal building.

IT will be up to Administrator James A. Moffett to kill all these birds with one stone—the National Housing Act.

A native of West Virginia, Moffett foresees re-employment of at least 5,000,000 men when the wheels of his administration get under way.
