and practices long recognized as desirable, but which uncontrollable competitive forces have heretofore rendered inactive. There can be no misrepresentation, no selling of printing below cost of manufacture. Misrepresentation has cost many of the merchants in town a pretty penny when they have gone elsewhere to buy their printing. But now the out-of-town printer is controlled in his business practices under the Code, and because of the restrictions that make him deal fairly, the Argus has all the advantage over him, for it knows best how to serve home business with commercial printing and newspaper advertising.
