should give me a present. It was awfully kind of her.

"I've chosen the sample for a wedding invitation I like best, and I'm sending you a list of my friends' names. I shouldn't have known I ought to do this if you hadn't told me about it. There never has been a wedding in the little church here, but we can have ours there, if you wish. Mr. Hains, our minister, would be pleased to have your brother Arthur take part in the ceremony."

"I think the little flat will be wonderful. I love mission furniture and brass beds."

"What do you think? Mr. and Mrs. Goldenburg have invited me to New York with them! Mr. Goldenburg takes a trip every year at this time to buy his fall stock, and he's going to help me make my money go a long way in getting my trousseau. We're leaving Monday, so send your next letter to me at the Waldorf Astoria hotel, New York city. I think we'll be gone a whole week. I simply can't believe it's true. Next to getting engaged to you, it's the most wonderful thing that ever happened to me."

"George feels terribly. He hardly looks at me when I meet him, and he won't speak to me at all. But Roy and his mother have been awfully kind."

"I wish I could write letters like you."

EVERY WORTHY LIFE DESERVES AN EVER-LASTING MONUMENT

TO all the generations of posterity the Memorial is a lesson in respect, devotion and honor. To them, it is the teacher of life's ideals, its achievements, and its examples. The memorial is the one perpetual history of life. Without it, a life's record often passes entirely, for the unmarked grave too soon becomes the unknown, unvisited one.

youself—with vulgarity! I suppose your language—and your conduct—are the result of your political associations. You should never have allowed yourself a gentlemanly birth at least—to be drawn into them."

He got up suddenly, and stood with his hands on the back of his chair, facing them.

"Look here," he said abruptly, almost violently. "I've had a long drive and I'm tired. I'm going to bed. But I'll tell you this much, and then we won't discuss the subject again. I'll continue my usual subscription to this household just as long as you're decent to Anne. Not a second longer. It may not be very aristocratic to bargain, but I notice that none of the rest of you seem to want to work, and I don't believe you want to go hungry. You better think it over."

There was no hint of this battle, however, or of his own victory, when he wrote Anne.

"Dearest—darling—sweetheart—it began."

"I can't find any name lovely enough and strong enough to tell you how I feel about you."

"I miss you so terribly that I'm doing everything I can to shorten our separation. I've found a little home for us. It's very small—just a living room, bedroom and kitchen, but we could manage in that for this winter, couldn't we? The furniture's rather awful—miscellaneous and in your house? I don't mind if you don't."

"I've been to a stationer's, and asked him to send you some samples of wedding invitations. I thought perhaps it would be easier for me to attend to that than you. Write me which you like best, and a list of your friends whom you want to invite, and I'll have the cards addressed and sent out from here."

"Do you think you can manage a church wedding? And is there a church parson or something of the sort in which you could have a reception afterwards? Of course my family and some of my friends will want to come up, and I realize how bitterly they would resent my engagement in the Wallace town. Bugle. Having thus burned all his bridges behind him, he departed to tell his father and mother of his impending plunge into matrimony."

He had adroitly contrived to avoid much discussion of the Conrads with Anne. He knew, all too well, how bitterly they were bound to oppose the match, but he hoped, as far as possible, to keep this knowledge from her. Mrs. Conrad came from one of the oldest families in the country, and she never forgot it or allowed anyone else to forget it. All humanity to her, was divided into two classes—those who were "refined" and those who were not. Her husband's standards were much like her own, and his sense of self-importance quite equalled hers, though like herself, he depended largely on the past to establish his claim to distinction. He had never made much headway in his profession as an architect. They had very little money, but they tried to keep up appearances in a way that was almost uncanny. Their eldest son, Arthur, an unmarried clergyman, and their widowed daughter, Harriet, lived with them, as well as a young nephew, Neal, who was a student in law. In this way, their income went much further than it otherwise would have done. Harriet had very pronounced views on the subject of character without his charm. Her husband had committed suicide by jumping from a sixth story window while they were on their honeymoon.

Neal burst in upon his family, kissed his mother and sister dutifully, but without enthusiasm, and told them, immediately, of the fat fee which he had captured in the course of his vacation. Then he told the rest of his story.

"Dearest Neal: The ring came this morning, and fits perfectly. I put it on right away, and have it on now. Of course it's the most beautiful thing I ever saw in my life."

"Your mother's letter came, too, and a lovely brooch which she said had belonged to your great-grandmother, and which she had kept for your wife ever since you were a little boy. I put that on, too, though it looks strange with my percale dress. I suppose you've seen it. It's beautiful, too, but of course I like the ring best. I was very much surprised that your mother should give me a present. It was awfully kind of her.
