Grass pastures this fall than usual. Some of these apparently have to mind permanent pastures, while a good many want temporary pasture for a year or two only.

For early spring pasture probably common rye grass is as desirable as anything. This will make an early spring growth, is highly palatable and when seeded at the rate of about 18 to 20 pounds per acre will just about crowd out anything else.

Orchard grass, English rye grass, red top, meadow fescue, tall oat grass, timothy, common white clover, ladino clover and alsike clover are more commonly used. These are not the only grasses that may be used but these are the most common ones and seed of these may usually be obtained almost anywhere.

Not all of these should be used in any one mixture for any one soil type. The exact combination that may be advisable to use will depend on soil conditions. Questions are frequently asked about seeding canary grass on upland. Reed canary grass is a wetland grass and thrives best under conditions where there is an abundance of moisture throughout the summer months.

An excessive amount of water in the winter time, even where the grass is covered with water for four or five months does not hurt it. There is a highland strain of reed canary grass which is being developed and which is being tried in a few small seedings in the county. In seeding reed canary grass on wet bottom land, if it can be seeded in the fall that is probably the more preferable time to get it started.

On the Ed Freudenthal place, two years ago canary grass was seeded in the fall and the water flooded over it within two weeks from the time it was seeded. This seed lay there under the water all winter and came up in the spring.

In October, 1933, 14 varieties of grass were seeded on plots on the Elmer Guerber farm near Helvetia. Of the varieties seeded tall fescue, meadow fescue, tall oat grass, English rye grass, domestic rye grass and highland bent were the better. Tall fescue is apparently a very fine grass but seed at the present time is not available.

Grasses, like any other crop, need some care and occasionally some fertilizer. Continuous close pasturing probably kills out grass pasture quicker than anything else. The grass should have a chance to grow a little each year without being kept pastured right to the ground. Applications of phosphate and nitrate in some form are occasionally advisable. On some soils potash is necessary. Light top dressings of barnyard manure put on in the fall are also good but usually there is not a sufficient amount
