Queen Anne's Lace By Frances Parkinson Keyes

By the time the nine days' excitement had subsided somewhat, the housecleaning was finished, groceries and coal had been ordered, and Anne had gone to Hillsboro to help Dora finish closing the house there, and bring the maid and the children back with her to Washington.

Then Anne's daily round of work began. After an early breakfast, she walked over to the garage—the nearest one they had been able to find—was several blocks away—and got the car, while Neal read the morning paper, for it was, of course, important that he should keep himself thoroughly informed about current events. By the time she had taken the children to school he was, however, ready to have her take him to the office building.

After she had left him there she did the marketing, for the "cash and carry" stores were much cheaper than the ones that delivered. Back at the little yellow brick house the chamberwork awaited her, for Dora had agreed to take care of the furnace if Anne would do this. In no time the hands of the clock were pointing to the hour at which she must go and get the children; steer them through their lunch, and get them ready for school. Then there were the simple home lessons with which they needed help, preparation for Sunday school on Saturday night, and take them to Saturday morning. There was supper to get for all of them on Dora's night out—a hearty supper, spilling a great average of last week's 99.9. In the lower grades almost every student had joined the book league. Their spelling grade average was 97.

ers, you know. But of course I don't need to tell you all this! How are you getting on with your own visits?"

"My own visits?" gasped Anne, thinking of the windows she had scrubbed and all the other pushing, dabbled duties which made her press her hands against her temples at night, they hurried her so. Visits indeed!

"Of course you've called promptly on all your superiors in rank—it's so important to do that at once. It creates quite a wrong impression if you don't. Well, next week we shall expect to see you, dear Mrs. Conrad. We always receive together, we're such friends. Of course, you've heard how intimate we are."

They rose, shook hands, and hurried away with staccato exclamations about ten more calls to make. The front door closed behind them, but Anne could hear them talking as they went down the steps.

"My dear, do you ever? I do believe all those stories about the cow and the washtub and everything else are true, don't you? No tea no one to open the door, and those shabby clothes, what did she do in Paris do you suppose, go to art galleries? And it's evident she doesn't know thing about what's expected of her."

Oh, Madame Estavi, are you coming to call on Mrs. Conrad, too? Yes, we've just seen, she is in.

Another caller was coming up the steps, and Anne saw, with relief, that the new visitor was of a different type; was indeed herself timid and ill at ease, in spite of her pretty clothes and air of unmistakable good breeding. But this relief was short-lived. Madame Estavi, the wife of the Peruvian ambassador, was herself a newcomer embarking on her first round of calls. She accepted the place by the fire so recently vacated, and hid behind herself very erect, with painful pauses, which Anne did not know how to fill in between her civil, stilted little remarks.

These pauses, a fearful shriek rent the air; and an instant later, Nancy, with Junior in hot pursuit, were wildly into the room, tripping over the rug and fell sprawling on the floor between the two ladies.

The astonished caller rose, looking very much startled.

"Really, they don't of ten act like this. Junior, go upstairs and wash that—that what-ever it is—off your face and hands. And stay there until I send for you. Please, Madame Estavi—But Madame Estavi had quietly and effectively vanished and the respective callers coming up the steps. Before the riotous and untidy children could be eliminated, these callers were upon Anne.

The dreadful afternoon wore on. Anne, nervously keeping her eyes from the clock, was nevertheless aware that Neal would be expecting her, would be waiting for her, and yet she could not escape and go to him. At last the telephone rang sharply.

"Neal dear," she whispered into the transmitter, "I can't come for you, I'm sorry. No, I can't speak any louder, there are people here, they'll hear me. No, I can't explain. No, no. No, the children aren't either."

She returned to the drawing room certain that she had been overheard. Well, that was bad enough, but at least it meant that these intruding strangers would go—would leave her in peace. But it did not. Sensing that something was amiss, and eager to know what it was, they lingered to find out.

Neal let himself in with his latchkey, banging the door after him, and shouting to her from the hall, "Why didn't you tell me you were going to have company?"

"I waited, and waited..." Neither of them ever referred again to the next few minutes. He strode into the little parlor, halted, and became dumb. Introductions were mumbled, but afterwards the silence deepened. One by one, disappointed, the callers departed. As the last one vanished from sight and hearing Anne turned on her husband with a rage such as she had seldom seen him display.

"Don't you ever dare speak to me that way again!" she cried. "You ought to have realized I was in some difficulty and help me out instead of making things ten times worse than they were already! You ought to have known that senators' wives have to receive on Thursdays and make mounds and thousands of calls themselves other days, dropping dog-eared cards from one end of Washington to the other. Tomorrow I'm going to get all his straightened out by some one who knows and will tell me all about it."

I'll find out what I've got to do, and do it well."

"Why, Anne," said Neal, gently, "I'm awfully sorry. I didn't think. His own annoyance had vanished into thin air at the sight of her distress, which he did not minimize. He spoke with unaccustomed and unexpected tenderness. "During its all right. You'll get the hang of all this in no time. Anne—don't cry."

At nine o'clock the next morning Anne called up the Vice President's house, and asked for Mrs. Hammel. A smooth purring voice that sounded, somewhat in spite of its smoothness, as if it might, upon occasion, grow dreadfully hard, answered, "Miss Butters speaking."

"This is Mrs. Neal Conrad, Senator Conrad's wife. I asked for Mrs. Hammel."

"Oh—but you see Mrs. Hammel never goes to the telephone, Mrs. Conrad. Couldn't you give me the message? I am her secretary, you know. I take all her messages. Everyone who wishes to get in touch with Mrs. Hammel does so through me."

Again approved, again convicted of ignorance! Anne felt herself flushing, alone in the little dark entry where her telephone hung. But she gritted her teeth.

"I wonder if she would let me come and see her? Today?"

"Today? Really?" Mrs. Conrad, I don't know whether that would be possible. Mrs. Hammel would be delighted to see you of course, but she is very much engaged. Perhaps next week I could give you an appointment."

"Won't you ask her whether she would see me? It's really urgent."

"In that case..." What is your telephone number, Mrs. Conrad? I will try to call you back a little later. But of course I can't promise. Mrs. Hammel always gives up her mornings to her correspondence, we try not to let anything disturb her. There are so many demands upon her, you see."
