CHAPTER X I DO solemnly swear that I will support and defend the Constitution of the United States against all enemies, foreign and domestic; that I will bear true faith and allegiance to the same; that I take this obligation freely, without any mental reservation or purpose of evasion; and that I will well and faithfully discharge the duties of the office in which I am about to enter—so help me God.

Neal, facing the Vice President, with his back to the senate chamber, stood beside Senator Brown, repeating the words, a phrase at a time, after Mr. Hammel. Anne, sitting in the senator's gallery, her cold hands clenched tightly in her lap, colder chills of excitement creeping up and down her spine and snatching swiftly at her heart, looked at him with misty eyes.

It was the opening day of congress, and Neal had repeated the oath of office administered to a new senator, and then, literally, had taken his seat.

Anne had not been to the Capitol since she had visited it, years before, on her honeymoon journey to Washington. She confronted the doorman of the senator's gallery with a persistent moan which was striving to get past him, and which even his massive bulk and grim manner could not entirely stem.

"Mrs. Conrad?" he snarled, peering at her with suspicious, bugging eyes. "Senator Conrad's wife? She can't don't go down any more. He's got three wives in there already."

There was a letter of clerical growing hot. "I will try to get some one to identify me," she said with a composure which she was very far from feeling.

"That won't be very hard," a merry voice boomed behind her; and turning suddenly, she almost bumped into Mrs. Hammel, who had just asked her a question.

"You are coming over to the luncheon, of course?" "The luncheon?" "Don't tell me there is another thing you haven't heard about! Well, I will explain as we go over to the subway. We will say good-by to Mrs. Hastings here. They don't come with us."

Breathlessly, Anne followed Mrs. Hammel through the crowd to the basement of the Capitol, and into a small open elevator. The little crowd leaped forward, and they bounded noisily away. By raising her voice Mrs. Hammel succeeded in making Anne hear above the clatter.

This oath that Neal was taking seemed to her no less solemn, no less sacred—did he, she wondered, feel the same way about it? She hoped prayerfully that he did.

At all events, he had not forgotten her in this great and pregnant moment of his life. He had hardly taken his seat when he turned, swept the gallery with his keen eyes, and smiled as he found her and saw the expression of love and emotion on her face.

For a moment they looked into each other; Anne felt her composure returning, her vision clearing. She was able to return his smile. Then apparently satisfied, he nodded and looked away again, giving his undivided attention to the business of the day.

This did not last long. The Vice President's gavel descended. The crowd began to stream out. Anne was conscious that Mrs. Hammel was speaking to her.

"You'll come to the house, tomorrow, of course, to hear the program and hear my message?" "Oh, of course! I wouldn't miss it for anything!"

As a matter of fact, she had not intended to do anything of the sort; her interest in public affairs was still bounded by Neal's participation in them; and Neal, who had been a figure of importance today, would have no part in the morning's proceedings. But it was evident that Mrs. Hammel expected her to return to the Capitol the next day; and Mrs. Hammel should never be disappointed in her.

Her determination was rewarded. When Neal came home that night, he gave her a beautifully engraved little card upon the back of which she discovered the number, row and section of a reserved seat. And with this, she perceived the house of representatives without difficulty; and, having found her appointed place, she saw that Mrs. Hammel, Mrs. Hastings and several other women whom she knew were all near her, and when Mrs. Shaw, accompanied by a military aide, came in and sat down immediately about her, and which she experienced an expected thrill in being presented to the first lady of the land.

The President began to speak, Anne's sense of stimulation faded. Anne's sense of stimulation faded. Anne's sense of stimulation faded.

The marble room proved a most imposing apartment. Down its wide length ran a long narrow table, covered with a white cloth. Thermos bottles, plates of rolls and jelly, and large heavily frosted cakes were placed upon this at regular intervals; and several well-dressed women were fluttering about it, pouring water and staidly silverware.

There was a good deal of informal merriment—a much pleasanter mood than the one above. The little crowd of women, dressed in the big, heavy frosted cakes were placed upon this at regular intervals; and several well-dressed women were fluttering about it, pouring water and staidly silverware.

Train at Timber Struck by Boulder

(By Lois Richmond) TIMBER—As the outgoing local freight bound for Tillamook passed through tunnel No. 28 a large boulder crashed down the mountainside and passed through the rear coach. The impact broke three windows and left a large hole in the roof of the car where the boulder passed through. The car was sent to Brooklyn yards for repairs. The car was unoccupied.

Mr. and Mrs. Harvey Wilson spent Thanksgiving with Mr. Wilson's mother, Mrs. Mabel Wilson, at Gates Creek. Word has been received that Morris Dean, son of Mrs. B. H. Tillotson, who has been stationed herself carried off for a conference. A salad, it was decided, was to be her contribution. The merry little party broke up when the deliberations of the committee were finished.

The morning after the senate ladies luncheon, Mrs. Lee called Anne on the telephone, and inquired if she might not stop and take her to the Congressional club reception on Friday.

"You have had an invitation to go, of course?" "Yes—but you see I have been so busy making diplomatic calls—" "I know—it is hard to wedge both the calls and the clubs in the same afternoon. But everything is over at the club a little after five, and that leaves almost another hour for calls afterwards. If you are pretty well, couldn't you manage somehow?"

"I believe I could; especially as I would love to go to the club with you," Anne said frankly. "I am so glad for I would love to take you," responded Mrs. Lee cordially. "Promptly at 2:45 then."
