GO FORWARD!

Has Ever Been Our Code

With the depression came a keen, analytical scrutiny on the part of the buying public to determine conclusively that when a dollar was spent, 100 cents worth of service or commodities was received in exchange. People let loose of money grudgingly and apprehensively. Luxuries and non-essentials on the sales curve skidded downward and any product to hold its own was forced to prove its merit and usefulness to the consumer. For that reason, the Hillsboro Argus continued on during the past three years of duress and economic inactivity building a better product with each succeeding issue. And because it provided "value received" many times over for the money expended, more and more families have turned to it for their home and county newspaper. More people read the Hillsboro Argus today, than have ever read any newspaper published in Washington county. The Argus has consistently forged ahead throughout the depression.
