Peter's Pentecost Sermon

Text: Acts 2:22-28, 36-41

The International Uniform Sunday School Lesson for Feb. 10.

* * *

A VERY changed man from the fearful figure who sat by the fire in the court of the hall of judgment, and vehemently denied that he knew Jesus, was the Peter of the Day of Pentecost.

With the restoration of Peter to the circle of disciples, with assurance of the Master's forgiveness and love, and with the threefold protestations of his own love, there came to Peter the old-time courage and the self-forgetfulness of a passionate hope and faith.

The opportunity of displaying this faith and courage, that came to him on the Day of Pentecost, was unique. The disciples, in fear and perplexity following the crucifixion of Jesus, had their faith revived with the evidences of His resurrection, and went forth with the spirit of conquest that had inspired them in their first coming to Jesus and their acceptance of discipleship.

Now on the Day of Pentecost, we are told, they were gathered in one place with one accord; old jealousies and ambitions were forgotten in the glory of the things that filled their souls; outward manifestations of the tense spirit that moved them, only increased the spirit of expectation and enthusiasm.

* * *

EVERYTHING was ripe for a profound and deep experience, and we have a deeply moving narrative of the first great religious event following the death and resurrection of Jesus, in the founding of the Christian church.

To Peter fell the responsibility and privilege of being the chief speaker on the occasion. The exact nature of the scene and of the audience is not indicated, but apparently there were many onlookers whose interest in what was happening was not that of an intense discipleship, but who may, none the less, have been drawn by sufficient interest to come under the influence of Peter's preaching.

Apparently there was a number of this sort there, otherwise Peter would not have spoken so plainly and intensely concerning the guilt of those who had crucified Jesus.

Peter's poignant words struck home, and the result of his preaching was that about 3000 souls were added to the church, which now had been definitely launched upon its historical development.

* * *

THE effects of Peter's sermon and all the influences of Pentecost were as extensive and remarkable as they were deep. Swept away by the vision and power of the new ideal, a spirit of brotherly love and devotion took hold of the disciples, lifting them above all selfish interests and leading them even into giving up their private property and putting it into a common fund.

The world, for the most part, has condemned this economic manifestation of their religious earnestness and interest as universally as it has commended the quality of the experience itself. But one may well pause to wonder whether a similar great outpouring of religious grace, with its consequent enthusiasm, would not solve many of our modern problems, and one wonders at times whether such problems can ever be solved except as men and women everywhere are baptized with a new power of unselfish motive and action.

Certainly, if we could bring all men under the power and experience of Pentecost, it would matter little what forms the social change might take.

A world built on unselfishness, such as these disciples displayed following Pentecost, would be a world where most of its problems could be easily solved.

Evangelist Leavitt Will End Meetings

Teddy Leavitt, evangelist at the Christian church, is drawing the largest crowds in years. A packed house heard his sermon Sunday night on "What are you going to do about your sins?" A large young people's choir every night is one of the unusual features. Special music is being furnished by local soloists of the community. Sunday night the Bunnell sisters trio sang two sacred numbers.

This week, the last week of the local series of meetings, the evangelist will tell of his wonderful experiences as an evangelist in the logging and mining camps of this and other states. Teddy Leavitt began his career as a logger and since has been evangelizing in over one hundred different communities in Oregon. Saturday night he concludes his talk on "Choked to Death by the Devil." Modern pleasures and what the evangelist thinks of them is to be presented.

Sunday is the closing day of the Leavitt meetings. An aim of 300 in the church school has been set. This goal if attained will be the highest ever reached in this city by the local school. The highest record was attained last Easter when 273 were reported. Thirty-five have responded to the evangelist's invitations in first three weeks.
