CHINA LAND OF MYSTERY PLAYS HOST TO MARINES

(By Richard Riley)
Beneath the frowning hills of North China, where herds of nomadic Tartars once ravished the land, lies Peiping, one of the most famous cities in the world today. Centuries before Columbus ventured forth in quest of a New World, Peiping was recognized as the center of Chinese culture and civilization.
Since 1200 B. C. dynasty after dynasty has left the imprint of its rule upon the Forbidden City. Where Chinese emperors were once carried aloft on their glittering litters and fierce looking Mongol chieftains swaggered in their fighting finery, today the rhythmic tread of Uncle Sam's marines blends with the soft padding steps of Chinese coolies.
Peiping today is far different from the Peking of fifty years ago. Today the flags of the United States, England, France, Italy and Japan, fly over their separate legations in the City of Northern Peace. More than 2000 men serve under these banners as a guarantee of protection to their nationals. In this respect, particularly, the ancient walled city is an unusual city. It is the only metropolitan center in the world where so many troops are banded together in one common cause—protection.
With practically no exception, the men comprising the guards of the foreign legations live in comparative peace. Few disagreements among them have been recorded. High praise has been heaped upon them by Chinese officials for the valuable assistance they have rendered to the Chinese government.
The legations are laid out in such a manner that they form a formidable retreat in case of siege. Space has been provided for the nationals in case of an attack. The Boxer Rebellion of 1900 was the primary factor which moved these nations to establish legations and station troops in Peiping.
In the late 1800's secret bands of young radicals and rowdies formed societies which were known as "Righteous Harmony Bands." Their numbers grew rapidly. In 1899 when thousands of fanatical Chinese had rallied to the banners of the Boxers, they were called, they began molesting Chinese Christians. The agitation grew. Hundreds of Chinese were murdered outright by the Boxers. An English missionary was shot.
Frightened consuls despatched word to the Empress Dowager. She, instead of offering relief to the persecuted worshippers, was led by her advisors to fan the fire of hatred which was sweeping the land. Hundreds of Boxers began converging on Peking. Hurried calls were sent out by the various consuls for assistance.
Orders were issued for troops to go to the aid of the beleaguered foreigners. They encountered many delays. No co-operation was afforded them on their trip overland. Many days after their start they arrived at the gates of Peking.
In this group twenty-three marines and bluejackets under the command of Captain John T. Myers, who retired recently with the rank of major general, made up the defence force of the American Legation.
The defensive tactics of this handful of brave men, who fought back against terrific odds, until they were relieved on August 14, has become one of the military sagas of history. The many medals awarded by our government to the defence and relief of Peking, attests to their heroism. Eighteen Congressional Medals of Honor were awarded.
In September, 1900, the leathernecks were relieved from duty at

Meaning of 'Christian Life'

The International Uniform Sunday School Lesson for March 24.

CARRYING out the will of God was Jesus' description of the Christian life. And because the will of God is the will of an all-loving father, the carrying out of that will betokens the yielding up of heart, mind, soul and strength in love to God and to one's fellow men.
Paul defined the Christian life in the 13th of First Corinthians in terms of this love related to every virtue, every activity, and every goal.
Here in our lesson Peter defines the Christian life in details and terms of specific attitudes, tempers, and actions.
Christians in their life together must be like minded—that is, one in their common aims and hopes. They must be compassionate, tender hearted, humble minded, and loving as brethren.
There can be no real Christian life or Christian community apart from that attitude. Nor is this attitude merely one of ideal hopes and aims. It is to be realized in a very practical world full of temptations and full of offenses in which man seriously tries his brother.
UNDER these conditions the Christian will not render evil for evil; he will not revile again when he is reviled. On the contrary, he will show the reality of his Christianity by rendering good for evil, and by giving blessing for reviling. The Christian is called to inherit and practice blessedness.
Peter says that this sort of living is conducive to health and
