Coinage Clause in Constitution and Central Bank Issue Reviewed

Editor's Note—One of a series of discussions on constitutional questions prepared by members of the U. of O. faculty for newspaper use, through co-operation of the college of social sciences and school of journalism.

(By James H. Gilbert)
In Article I, Section 8 of the federal constitution, the powers of congress are listed and defined. Among these is an innocent looking clause, "to coin money, regulate the value thereof and of foreign coins and fix the standard of weights and measures."

Our dictionary tells us that the verb "to coin" means simply "to stamp and certify weight and purity," or "to manufacture metallic disks to serve as money."

Consider, then, that under this plain clause of the constitution our government has:

1. Chartered and controlled central banks;
2. Set up and supervised a national banking system and a federal reserve system;
3. Issued paper money based on coin and unsupported by any monetary reserve;
4. Given legal tender to depreciated notes;
5. Taxed state bank notes out of use;
6. Devalued the gold dollar and abrogated contracts running to a hundred billion, calling for payment in gold coin.

We begin to see how far we moved from the literal meaning of the organic law of the nation and how impossible it would be to "return to the constitution of our fathers."

Even before the mint was in operation far-sighted Alexander Hamilton recommended the establishment of the First United States bank with a capital of ten million, partly owned by the federal government which had representation on its board of directors. The treasury had the right to inspect and to call for statements from time to time.

This proposed partnership between the treasury and private finance was bound to raise fundamental questions of constitutionalism. Banking was of course nowhere mentioned in the constitution. There were no corporations in the whole country when the constitutional convention met and the proposal to give congress power to charter corporations was specifically rejected by the constitution makers.

The constitutionality of a central bank had President Washington puzzled and the matter was referred to Edmund Randolph, his attorney general and legal adviser. Randolph is inclined to strict construction of the constitution, found no warrant for a bank deriving its powers from the national government. Jefferson agreed with the attorney general.

Then came Hamilton's term and with the amazing ingenuity in matters of law, business and finance, he hit on the doctrine of implied powers to justify his cherished scheme for a national bank. In his rebuttal opinion supporting the central bank, the present federalist laid very broadly the foundation for a liberal, if not a loose construction of the constitution.

Admitting freely that neither bank nor corporation is mentioned in the organic law, he fell back on that "omnibus" clause of the document which concludes the enumeration of powers to be exercised by congress—"to make all laws which shall be necessary and proper for carrying into execution the foregoing powers—vested by this constitution in the government of the United States."

The words "necessary and proper" mean "fit, suitable, convenient and appropriate to a given end." Now congress had been given the power to "lay and collect taxes," "to borrow money on the credit of the United States," "to declare war and to raise and support armies," and "to coin money and regulate the value thereof." A central bank would be a convenient, fit and suitable agency for carrying into effect these very necessary functions and was therefore within the scope of the constitution, he argued.

Washington was convinced by Hamilton's argument and the bill creating and chartering the First United States bank for a period of twenty years was signed by the president.

The central bank proved to be "necessary and proper" and rendered invaluable service in fortifying the credit of the United States, in supplying a currency of uniform value throughout the country, and in forcing state banks to a sounder basis of note issue.

After the initial argument over the constitutionality of the bank the question was apparently regarded as a settled issue. True, it was to arise again in the early years of the Second United States bank and was to be the subject of one of the best known of John Marshall's decisions.

The charter of the First United States bank was to expire in 1811 and while it was strongly supported, even by stalwart Jeffersonians like Gallatin, it had aroused the jealousy and antagonism of the state banks then powerful in American politics.

Proposal to recharter the bank was defeated in the senate by a single vote. Constitutional questions played little or no part in the opposing arguments. It was
