Miss Frieda Korn, Daughter Local Folk, on World Tour

Frieda Lenore Korn, daughter of Mr. and Mrs. C. E. Korn of near here and for the last nine years making her home in San Francisco, left San Francisco February 21 on the President Coolidge on a six or seven months' pleasure trip around the world. She plans to spend considerable time in India and on the continent.

While she is primarily on a vacation she plans, however, to study and acquaint herself with the problems and difficulties of business and professional women throughout the world, especially the rehabilitation of the business women over forty, who through economic conditions of recent years have been forced out of the business world to make room for the employment of men.

(By Miss Frieda Lenore Korn)
Sailing into Honolulu Harbor is one of those rare, sweet experiences of life that for the moment at least make us forget the material things.

We arrived outside the harbor about six o'clock on a beautiful, clear morning just as Diamond Head was silhouetted against the huge bronze rays of the morning sun.

As the boat glides into the harbor you are first greeted by myriads of brown bodies splashing around in the water—native boys begging you to drop coins which they dive after and readily receive for themselves.

Then before you realize it you are fairly overcome by the warm strains of "Aloha Oe" and other songs of the islands, sung by the native women and men. Something so sweet, so beautiful, so enchanting—truly an experience that engenders.

Then the leis—thousands of them. Mayor Rossi of San Francisco and his party and Charlie Chaplin came with us from San Francisco, so his reception was even more impressive.

Honolulu is on the island of Oahu, is the main port of call for trans-Pacific steamships and the remains of lines running between the islands and the west coast of America and has a population of about 85,000.

Stately avenues of royal palms, groves of picturesque coconut palms (which Mark Twain once said looked like "a feather duster struck by lightning"), the banyan trees, the monkey pod and many other beautiful trees furnish shady places in this earthly paradise.

And such a profusion of flowers and what a riot of color. It is claimed there are about nine hundred species of flowering plants, 600 of which are peculiar to the islands. The most fascinating among them is the night blooming cereus, which gives off a most delicate perfume as it blooms during the night. And yet among all this heavenly vegetation there is no malaria, no poison oak, ivy or other noxious plants.

Perhaps the most interesting of the delicious tropical fruits which abound here is the papaya, a year-round delicacy which resembles a golden melon, but grows on trees. It has an indelible bouquet flavor and is a great aid to digestion.

Sugar is Hawaii's principal industry, with pineapples second.

The native Hawaiians belong to the Polynesian race, a people occupying the Pacific islands scattered all the way from Hawaii to New Zealand and thence to Easter Island, a distance of 4000 miles.

The early history of Hawaii is lost in the myths and legends of a primitive people. When they first came or how and what was the beginning of their life is told only in their legends and traditions, their chants and genealogies. It is supposed that Spanish castaways were the first Europeans upon the islands, and that they came from one of Saavedra's ships lost on the way from Mexico to the Spice Islands in 1527. It was not until 1778, however, that Captain James Cook brought the islands into relation with the rest of the world.

The delegation from the Women's club that met me spared nothing to make my day in Honolulu a full one. So many, many places of interest. The drive to the Palis was beautiful along narrow roads edged with the native flowers and shrubs. Palis in Hawaii is a high precipice, but in this particular case it refers to one of the highest precipice on this island. It is the wreck of a mighty crater blown to atoms in some prehistoric convulsion of nature. From this height may be seen the remains of a crater far below, transformed now into a glorious view of pineapple plantations and the opalescent sea beyond.

Luncheon under shady trees at the Royal Hawaiian hotel with Waikiki beach in the foreground, where surf riding gives a thrill not to be gotten elsewhere.

Tea at the Aiola Tea House far up on Tantalus mountain overlooking Honolulu harbor. On these grounds is the original hut in which Robert Lewis Stevenson lived and wrote when he first came to the islands. A one-room grass hut not larger than an ordinary breakfast room with two openings for windows and one opening for a door—minus either the actual windows or door. In it now are only a very few pieces of crude furniture and many photographs of Stevenson and his family.

The waterfalls en route to the Palis, which through some curious suction of air currents through the canyons forces the water to flow or give the appearance of falling uphill. As all newcomers to Hawaii do, I tasted poi, the Hawaiian staple of life. It tastes like old time pajamas without salt and just a dash of anything that tastes awful.

All along the streets one sees native men and women striding, beautifully colored and fragrant flowers on strings and making their way together to form a continuous tie of never-ending friendship. Legend has it that if you throw your leis into the blue waters on leaving you shall always return.

Too soon it is time to board the ship and the Aloha spirit of Hawaii with its beauty, fragrance and floral leis becomes only a memory as the last soft strains of Aloha fade in the distant twilight.
